Dear Osler,

I was glad to get your letter, it is so long since we met that I was thinking of writing but had no very urgent excuse, if indeed such were needed. I was sorry that I was out when you looked in some weeks ago.

I was very much surprised by the College of Physicians' election; I did not know F. Taylor was ill and did not go to the meeting; I could not as there was a meeting at the hospital about ~~poor~~ Trevor. All I know I heard from your neighbour Singer: that no one was in the chair, that Ormerod made a statement about Taylor's incapacity and desire not to be re-elected, and that the election was gone on with. It will be a crowning comfort to Moore and he will enjoy it as the natural climax to a scholar-physician's life. I hope that he will not cease to be Librarian.

I have been away since the election and, except for Singer, have not seen any one who was at the College, or heard any further details. I fancy that it was a surprise to most people.

Yours ever,

H. D. ROLLESTON.

My wife is away now, but later on we should like to come down very much.

In the list of members of the club at the end of J. J. Payne volume we have marked "last son in war" opposite the name of Reginald and "last two sons" after one of them.
