

Direct

(Chap. XIII),
 No one knew better than Oles the necessity of the trained nurses that are there first and last many friends and daughter of friends and indeed the granddaughters of one of the chief of the James Bevell come to be registered in the scheme.

There was a good deal of fun made over the nurses' establishment, and I think that in one of Robb's letters he says that old Emery always insisted on calling them 'nurse-girls' much to their fury; and H. M. Thomas says that W. O. interested himself in the designs for their caps, insisting that as he had to see them around the wards every day in the week he was going to have the final say as to their design. It was inevitable that there was a good deal of banter on his part especially should the nurse happen to be of a good natured take herself a little too seriously.

a new change by the coming school a part of the hospital.