Dearest George,

I had written a letter in my mind, to you the night before last, but failed to put it on paper, & now the subject-matter has vanished, & so presumably was not of much value - Woffie has had a crazy attack, & so we have had two lovely, happy days & built-blocks & told stories & eaten oranges & forgotten the world & "all its troubled souls" - yesterday the world reappeared in the form of an invasion of cooks, whom I had to interview, as my good cook vanished last week owing to a catastrophe in the house of her carriage: Today I shall be a cross between a detective & an artistic traveller & go & search for characters.

Tomorrow I hope we shall bring again the due number of ^{our} wheels to the family coach.

Last night, - by way of refreshment I was reading part of the campaigns of Frederick the Great, - & felt much sympathy for the harassments of his campaign. High is the price that men & women pay for unaltered positions but our Queen has shown how powerful for good one such life may be. She was indeed a light - that shone from her high candlestick.

We are to have a memorial service in the Royal Victoria hall, tomorrow morning & I think it will be well done.
I believe Dr Peterson will give the address, & that the heads of the Theol. Colleges will take part & some good music received = whether is being in some of your observations. I never quite understand what you really enjoy, these entertainments or not but when talents - in particular certainly obtain her side than I think she thought talent through, I learned on the further shore, such for rest.

My dear Mr. I was just going to print this when another told me that the way went - we had heard that we come to pass. You I fear whether are the chief sufferers, I wish any of us could have received the blow, rather than you. I have had you are the injured I not the one to injure = you are not, must not think of justice you know you are right, but that will not make the slaves less cruel, I do not know whether legal steps, w^d still be practicable, but I think at whatever juncture call^d you may now see that a public council ~~of~~ w^d be evident - I w^d conceive the termination of Profr's beautiful memory, I w^d also probably tell another she bears upon you was ^{that} you may really, I has been successful, I am ^{glad} ^{to} ^{hear} by your tenderness to her since her cruel blood, she just as if we had other ties, but you, I that you are the most her, as we do not.

I think of his, I spare her, whatever goes.
I wish I w^d do something, any thing, you have always been nearer I desire to me than any of the others, I d^o has been one of my chief regrets that I c^d do so little for you as has R - all I can say is to repeat
