THE SHIPWRECK.

In winter's rude storm, when the tempests blow loud,
And the hail drives full hard 'gainst
the door,
And babes run together, like lambs in a crowd,
And cling to their mother, as, forth from a cloud, Fresh and deep-roaring torrents still pour :

When wolves through the forest in savageness scowl,
And poor lambs cry for help, but in vain ;—

And tigers for slaughter rush forward and howl,

And wreckers, as cruel, do savagely prowl Round the shores of the dark-troubled main :

'Tis then the poor bark often sinks in the wave,

And brave Seamen go down to the dead ;

No harbour, nor vessel, nor mortal to save,

To snatch one poor soul from a watery grave,

Or in pity to hold up his head.

But, ah ! there are scenes and sad tales yet behind,

Which may well make our heart-blood run chill ;

When the poor stranded vessel, long press'd by the wind,

Is driv'n on shore, but no safety can find From the wreckers, who plunder or kill.

'Twas gloomy December, and dark was the night,

And the sky was so wild and so drear, When to land all the sea birds, with screams, urg'd their flight,

Ere the long-forked stream 'gan to flash down its light,
And the thunders had burst on the ear.

'Twas then a poor bark was returning from far,
After crossing the wide western main,
Where oft, through the night-watch each long absent Tar Had cast a glad eye on the bright east ern star
Which directed his way home again.

And oft had they mus'd on the longhop'd-for morn,
When the wife and the husband should meet ;
When the parents and children, and lovers forlorn, Should confess, 'midst the troubles to which we are born, There are mingled some portions of sweet.

But who can now tell what to-morrow may bring,
When so frail and uncertain our time?
While mirth fills each heart, and so gaily we sing,
And dream not of danger, or any such thing, Oft our days are cut short in their prime,

So it prov'd with yon crew, who, nearing the land, Had concluded their dangers were past, When, lo! their own coast must become the fell strand Where Death, in the storm, shall pronounce his command,
Which numbers that day as their last.

A long time they strove, both with skill and with might,
To surmount all the dangers around ;
But torn were their sails in the last dismal night,
At day-dawn a lee-shore was full in their sight,
So they drove on the hard rocky ground.

Crash, crash, went the bark, as the big waves assail'd,
And her masts were plunged over the lee ;
Then, nor courage nor skill of commander avail'd, Death drew a long 'dart, and o'er many prevail'd,
And, half mangled, they sunk in the sea.

Now high flew the foam, as it broke o'er their head,

And the vessel groan'd under each blow,
And the raging surf roll'd o'er the dying and dead ;
And the rock's craggy cliff was their last lonely bed,
When the life-blood had ceased to flow.

These sights, so afflicting, to wreckers were dear,
Who live by fell rapine and crime ;
Whose eyes never shed soft Compassion's sweet tear, Whose hearts never learnt e'en their Maker to fear,
Or reflect on the end of their time.

Awhile lash'd to ring-bolts, some few yet remain,
And their shrieks rend the pitiless air ;
From the wreckers on shore no relief can they gain, (They beckon, and call, but they beckon in vain)
Who rejoice in the cries of despair.

Now shore-ward the masts and their tackling swing round,
And the wreckers begin their glad toil ;
They curse and blaspheme, while they cover the ground

With spars, and with sails, and whatever is found ;

For each seizes his share of the spoil.

When the tempest's wild fury had sometime allay'd,

They launch'd off, and boarded the bark ;

Where their hearts and their eyes still on plunder were stay'd,

Though the captain and crew for assistance oft pray'd

Ere extinct was life's faint, trembling spark.

Their cords were untied ; but the wet and the frost

Had so stiff'ned their limbs with the cold,

That the next breaking wave, as the vessel it cross'd,

Swept them over the side, and they quickly were lost,

While the wreckers held on a fast hold.

One fine youthful Sea Boy alone rode the wave,

And half lifeless was thrown on the sand ;

While his captain and comrades had each found their grave

Unpitied by wreckers, who strove not to save,
Or convey them for shelter to land.

Awhile those on shore throng'd the Ship Boy around,
And rudely asked all that he knew;
He told them his tale, as he lay on the ground,
While the blood from his temples a free course had found,
And still weaker and fainter he grew.

Now reviving, he turned his pale cheek from the earth,
And concluded his sorrowful tale,
By speaking of her who had given him birth,
A parent of tenderness, piety, and worth,
Who lived in a far distant vale.

“My mother,” said he, “she is old and gone blind,
But I love her most dearly and true—In my chest some relief for her wants you will find—Oh! save it for her who to me was so kind,
And the Lord will be kind unto you.”

They heard him, as wolves hear the ewes intercede
For the lambkins they torture and slay;

In an instant they left him to faint and to bleed, While they grappled his chest from a bank of sea-weed,
And like harpies they strove for the prey.

The news of a wreck, it soon spread along shore,
And women and men ran for gain ;
Thus numbers they harden each other the more,
Till to mercy and justice their hearts close the door,
That the love of curst money may reign,

Anon came the pious old Vicar that way,
For he heard there was evil abroad :
Against wrecking, and plund'ring, for many a day
He had preach'd ; but, alas ! there were few t' obey,
Or give heed to his tears or his word.
Arriv'd at the spot, what a scene was display'd !
For its numbers 'twas like to a fair ;
Dead bodies, and cargo, and trunks about lay'd, Or pil'd up in heaps where a sentinel stay'd ;
But, nor mercy nor pity was there.

The poor fainting Sea Boy the Vicar espied,

With his head lying hard on a rock ;
To aid whose distress, he sat down by his side,

And many a tear of compassion he cried,
While the wreckers continued to mock.

“ Ah ! Sir,” spake the Sea Boy, “ my blood it runs cold,

Here life’s voyage it shortly must end ;
I shall ne’er see my home, nor my parent behold ;

My tales and adventures for ever are told,

I shall never shake hands with a friend.

“ But four days ago, oh ! how happy was I,

And so was our cheerful ship’s band ;
But, alas ! the rude storm that late howl’d in the sky,

It has wreck’d our fine bark, and I shortly must die

On the shores of this hard-hearted land.

“ My mother oft said, when the young ravens cry,

How kind Heaven some succour still brings ;

Ah ! why then give up us poor seamen to die,

To perish, while men their assistance deny ?

Do explain, my good Sir, these strange things.

“ My Captain was kind to his lads and his men,

And kind was my mistress so dear,
That the poor never call'd and were bid call again ;

Who asked her relief never asked it in vain,

For she lov'd to dry misery's tear.

“ But now her kind heart, it will sorrow and break,

When she hears the sad tale of our wo ;

Keen anguish will pour its sharp stream down her cheek ;

In vain for support to these sharks may she seek ;

Down to ruin and death she must go.

“ And must the young babes of our dead plunder'd crew

Come and beg for their bread on this shore,

And be charg'd by the wreckers as idle, untrue ;

And be curs'd, and abus'd, as their cry they renew,

And some food for their hunger implore ?

“ Oh, Sir ! can kind Heav'n look on all the while,

And refrain its dread thunders to hurl?
Methinks, its blest spirits would speed down, and smile,
To inflict their dread anger on wreckers
 so vile,
And all angels their vengeance un-furl."

"Hush, hush, my dear child," cried the pious old man,

"All was right that was taught in thy youth :

From the day yonder sun his bright course first began,

Has thy Maker pursu'd one beneficent plan,

And his ways are all wisdom and truth.

"But deep, nay, and dark, they sometimes may appear,

Yet judgment surrounds his blest throne,

Whence he calls thee to trust him, to love, and to fear,

To submit as a child, while a sojourner here :

So far are his purposes known.

"What though yonder wreckers live out a long day,

And thyself find an early rough grave;
Though the wicked appear to succeed in their way,

And the kind-hearted Seaman becomes their fell prey,
Yet the righteous for ever he'll save.

“Not save from all troubles of life's stormy day,
But from evils hereafter to come;
Oft as death finds their feet treading duty's safe way, Still aiming their Saviour to love and obey,
He conveys their blest spirits straight home,

“But wo to the wrecker that dies in his sin!
To his soul there no peace can remain;
When his heart fails to beat, Oh! what torments begin,
The worm, never-dying, shall fasten within,
And the flame rage with infinite pain.

“From realms of despair he shall lift up an eye,
And behold the blest spirits above;
He shall call out for death, but he never shall die;
But shall plunge down the gulf, and in misery lie, While the saints share a heaven of love.

“Nay, on earth, the dread curse often enters his door,

And his children they die in ill time ;
His wealth is consum'd, and he, wretched and poor,

Can revel in plunder and pillage no more,

But must smart in old age for his crime.

“Oh ! turn then, dear youth, all thy thoughts to the sky,

For thy spirit must quickly depart :
To the Saviour of sinners direct thy last cry—

To pardon, and cleanse, and accept, he is nigh ;

May his peace now possess thy whole heart.”

So spake the good man, in kind accents, as mild

As the zephyrs that fan the still air ; Then he wip'd off the blood from the poor dying child,

Who, looking to heaven, with confidence, smil'd,

And thus uttered his last dying prayer :—

“O Jesus, thou Saviour of sinners below !

On thy mercy my soul it relies ; Cleanse its stains in thy blood, which so freely did flow ;

And, when thou shalt bid it these troubles forego, O take it to thee in the skies.

“Forget not my mother, poor, aged, and blind,

Nor leave her to sink down in grief;
Let a sense of thy love ever comfort her mind,

While her Sea Boy lies dead in a land far behind,

And can bring her no further relief.

“O pardon these wreckers, thou God of all grace!

Let their many dark crimes be forgiven;

Save, save them from wrath, from that horrible place,

And grant them to see a Redeemer's blest face;

O receive them, in mercy, to heaven!”

Thus saying, he bow'd his faint head to the ground,

And, expiring in peace, clos'd his prayer;

His soul, we may hope, will in glory be found,

Where no cries of distress ever utter their sound.

For no pains, no afflictions, are there.
