

THE

HISTORY

OF ENGLAND.

VOL. II.

THE

HISTORY

OF

ENGLAND,

FROM THE

INVASION OF JULIUS CÆSAR

TO

The REVOLUTION in 1688,

IN EIGHT VOLUMES.

By DAVID HUME, Efq:

VOL. II.

A NEW EDITION, with the Author's last Corrections and Improvements.

To which is prefixed,
A short ACCOUNT of his LIFE, written by himself.

LONDON:

Printed for T. CADELL, in the Strand.

MDCCLXXVIII.

BHT

HISTORY

等 0.

ENGLAND

ZHT MOAT

INVASION OF IULIUS CASAR

OT

The REVOLUTION in 1688.

IN FIGHT VOLUMES V

BY DAVID HUME, EGG

MOE. II.

AN WEDIT'S DAY, with the Corporation of Corrections and Impadrements.

To which is prefixed, A thorn ACCOUNT of the LIPE, withen Ex thanfall,

Printed this T. O. D. 22 to in the Stand

CONTENTS

OF THE

SECOND VOLUME.

CHAP. X.

RICHARD I.

The king's preparations for the crusade—Sets out on the crusade—Transactions in Sicily—King's arrival in Palestine—State of Palestine—

Disorders in England—The king's heroic actions in Palestine—His return to Palestine—

Captivity in Germany—War with France—
The king's delivery—Return to England—
War with France—Death—and character of the king—Miscellaneous transactions of this reign.

Page 1

CHAP. XI.

Accession of the king—His marriage—War with France—Murder of Arthur, duke of Britanny—The king expelled from all the French provinces—The king's quarrel with the court of Rome—Cardinal Langton appointed archbishop of Canterbury—Interdict of the kingdom—Excommunication of the king—The king's submission to the pope—Discontents of the barons—Insurrection of the barons—Magna Charta—Renewal of the civil wars—Prince Lewis called over—Death—and character of the king.

CONTENTS.

Page 39

APPENDIX II.

The FEUDAL and ANGLO-NORMAN GOVERNMENT and MANNERS.

Origin of the feudal law——Its progress——Feudal government of England——The feudal parliament——The commons——Judicial power——Revenue of the crown——Commerce——The church——Civil Laws——Manners.

CHAP. XII.

HENRY III.

Settlement of the government—General pacification
—Death of the protector—Some commotions
—Hubert de Burgh displaced—The bishop of Winchester minister—King's partiality to foreigners—Grievances—Ecclesiastical grievances
—Earl of Cornwal elected king of the Romans
—Discontent of the barons—Simon de Mountfort earl of Leicester—Provisions of Oxford—Usurpation of the barons—Prince Edward

CONTENTS

ward—Civil wars of the barons—Reference to the king of France—Renewal of the civil wars—Battle of Lewes—House of commons —Battle of Evesham and death of Leicester—Settlement of the government—Death—and character of the king—Miscellaneous transactions of this reign.

Page 143

CHAP. XIII. EDWARD I.

Civil administration of the king—-Conquest of Wales——Affairs of Scotland——Competitors for the crown of Scotland——Reference to Edward——Homage of Scotland——Award of Edward in favour of Baliol——War with France——Digression concerning the constitution of parliament——War with Scotland——Scotland subdued——War with France——Dissensions with the clergy——Arbitrary measures——Peace with France——Revolt of Scotland——That kingdom again subdued——again revolts——is again subdued——Robert Bruce——Third revolt of Scotland——Death—and character of the king——Miscellaneous transactions of this reign,

CHAP. XIV.

EDWARD II.

Weakness of the king—His passion for favourites
—Piers Gavaston—Discontent of the barons
—Murder of Gavaston—War with Scotland

Battle

CONTENTS.

——Battle of Bannockburn—Hugh le Despenfer—Civil commotions—Execution of the earl of Lancaster—Conspiracy against the king— Insurrection—The king dethroned—Murdered —His character—Miscellaneous transactions in this reign.

Page 327

CHAP. XV. EDWARD III.

War with Scotland—Execution of the earl of Kent
—Execution of Mortimer, earl of March—
State of Scotland—War with that kingdom—
King's claim to the crown of France—Preparations for war with France—War—Naval wistory—Domestic disturbances—Affairs of Britanny—Renewal of the war with France—Invasion of France—Battle of Crecy—War with Scotland—Captivity of the king of Scots—Calais taken.

CHAP. XVI.

Institution of the garter—State of France—Battle of Poittiers—Captivity of the king of France—State of that kingdom—Invasion of France—Peace of Bretigni—State of France—Expedition into Castile—Rupture with France—Ill success of the English—Death of the prince of Wales—Death—and character of the king—Miscellaneous transactions in this reign.

THE

th

HISTORY

OF ENGLAND.

CHAP. X.

RICHARD I.

The king's preparations for the crusade——Sets out on the crusade — Transactions in Sicily — King's arrival in Palestine——State of Palestine——Disorders in England——The king's heroic actions in Palestine——His return from Palestine——Captivity in Germany——War with France——The king's delivery——Return to England——War with France——Death——and character of the king——Miscellaneous transactions of this reign.

HE compunction of Richard, for his undutiful C H A P.

behaviour towards his father, was durable, and influenced him in the choice of his ministers and fervants after his accession. Those who had seconded and favoured his rebellion, instead of meeting with that trust and honour which they expected, were surprized
Vol. II.

B

to

C H A P. to find, that they lay under difgrace with the new king, and were on all occasions hated and despised by him-The faithful ministers of Henry, who had vigorously opposed all the enterprizes of his fons, were received with open arms, and were continued in those offices which they had honourably discharged to their former master 2. This prudent conduct might be the result of reflection; but in a prince, like Richard, fo much guided by passion, and fo little by policy, it was commonly afcribed to a principle still more virtuous and more honourable.

> RICHARD, that he might make atonement to one parent for his breach of duty to the other, immediately fent orders for releafing the queen-dowager from the confinement in which the had long been detained; and he entrusted her with the government of England, till his arrival in that kingdom. His bounty to his brother John was rather profuse and imprudent. Besides bestowing on him the county of Mortaigne in Normandy, granting him a pension of four thousand marks a year, and marrving him to Avisa, the daughter of the earl of Glocester, by whom he inherited all the possessions of that opulent family; he increased this appanage, which the late king. had destined him, by other extensive grants and concesfions. He conferred on him the whole estate of William Peverell, which had escheated to the crown: He put him in possession of eight castles, with all the forests and honours annexed to them: He delivered over to him no less than fix earldoms, Cornwal, Devon, Somerfet, Nottingham, Dorset, Lancaster, and Derby. And endeavouring. by favours, to fix that vicious prince in his duty, he put it too much in his power, whenever he pleased, to depart from it.

The king's fade.

THE king, impelled more by the love of military glory preparation than by fuperstition, acted, from the beginning of his a Hoveden, p. 655. Bened. Abb. p. 547. M. Paris, p. 107.

reign,

re

1189.

reign, as if the sole purpose of his government had been C H A P. the relief of the Holy Land, and the recovery of Jerufalem from the Saracens. This zeal against infidels, being communicated to his fubjects, broke out in London on the day of his coronation, and made them find a crufade less dangerous, and attended with more immediate profit. The prejudices of the age had made the lending of money on interest pass by the invidious name of usury: Yet the necessity of the practice had still continued it, and the greater part of that kind of dealing fell every where into the hands of the Jews; who, being already infamous on account of their religion, had no honour to lofe, and were apt to exercise a profession, odious in itself, by every kind of rigour, and even fometimes by rapine and extortion. The industry and frugality of this people had put them in possession of all the ready money, which the idleness and profusion, common to the English with other European nations, enabled them to lend at exorbitant and unequal interest. The monkish writers reprefent it as a great stain on the wife and equitable government of Henry, that he had carefully protected this infidel race from all injuries and infults; but the zeal of Richard afforded the populace a pretence for venting their animofity against them. The king had iffued an edict, prohibiting their appearance at his coronation; but fome of them, bringing him large presents from their nation. prefumed, in confidence of that merit, to approach the hall in which he dined: Being discovered, they were exposed to the infults of the bystanders; they took to flight; the people purfued them; the rumor was spread, that the king had issued orders to massacre all the Jews; a command fo agreeable was executed in an instant on fuch as fell into the hands of the populace; those who had kept at home were exposed to equal danger; the people, moved by rapacity and zeal, broke into their B 2

4

C H A P. houses, which they plundered, after having murdered the owners; where the Jews barricadoed their doors, and defended themselves with vigour, the rabble set fire to the houses, and made way through the flames to exercise their pillage and violence; the usual licentiousness of London, which the fovereign power with difficulty restrained, broke out with fury, and continued these outrages; the houses of the rich citizens, though Christians, were next attacked and plundered; and weariness and satiety at last put an end to the disorder: Yet when the king impowered Glanville, the justiciary, to enquire into the authors of these crimes, the guilt was found to involve so many of the most considerable citizens, that it was deemed more prudent to drop the profecution; and very few fuffered the punishment due to this enormity. But the disorder flopped not at London. The inhabitants of the other cities of England, hearing of this flaughter of the Jews, imitated the example: In York, five hundred of that nation, who had retired into the castle for safety, and found themselves unable to defend the place, murdered their own wives and children, threw the dead bodies over the walls upon the populace, and then fetting fire to the houses, perished in the slames. The gentry of the neighbourhood, who were all indebted to the Jews, ran to the cathedral, where their bonds were kept, and made a folemn bonfire of the papers before the altar. The compiler of the annals of Waverley, in relating these events, bleffes the Almighty for thus delivering over this impious race to destruction b.

THE ancient fituation of England, when the people possessed little riches and the public no credit, made it impossible for sovereigns to bear the expence of a steady or durable war, even on their frontiers; much less could they find regular means for the support of distant expedi-

b Gale's Collect. vol. iii. p. 165.

X.

1189.

tions like those into Palestine, which were more the result C H A P. of popular frenzy than of fober reason or deliberate policy. Richard, therefore, knew, that he must carry with him all the treasure necessary for his enterprize, and that both the remoteness of his own country and its poverty made it unable to furnish him with those continued supplies, which the exigencies of fo perilous a war must necessarily require. His father had left him a treasure of above a hundred thousand marks; and the king, negligent of every confideration, but his present object, endeavoured to augment this fum by all expedients, how pernicious foever to the public, or dangerous to royal authority. He put to fale the revenues and manors of the crown; the offices of greatest trust and power, even those of forester and sheriff, which anciently were so important c, became venal; the dignity of chief justiciary, in whose hands was lodged the whole execution of the laws, was fold to Hugh de Puzas, bishop of Durham, for a thousand marks; the fame prelate bought the earldom of Northumberland for life d; many of the champions of the cross, who had repented of their vow, purchased the liberty of violating it; and Richard, who stood less in need of men than of money, dispensed, on these conditions, with their attendance. Elated with the hopes of fame, which in that age attended no wars but those against the infidels, he was blind to every other confideration; and when fome of his wifer ministers objected to this distipation of the revenue and power of the crown, he replied, that he would fell London itself could he find a purchaser . Nothing indeed could be a stronger proof how negligent he was of all future interests in comparison of the crusade, than his selling, for fo small a sum as 10,000 marks, the vassalage of c The sheriff had anciently both the administration of justice and the management of the king's revenue committed to him in the county. See Hale of Sheriffs Accounts.

d M. Paris, p. 109. e W. Heming. p. 519. Knyghton, p. 2402. B 3 Scotland,

Berwic, the greatest acquisition that had been made by his father during the course of his victorious reign; and his accepting the homage of William in the usual terms, merely for the territories which that prince held in England. The English of all ranks and stations were oppressed by numerous exactions: Menaces were employed both against the innocent and the guilty, in order to extort money from them: And where a pretence was wanting against the rich, the king obliged them, by the fear of his displeasure, to lend him sums, which, he knew, it would never be in his power to repay.

BUT Richard, though he facrificed every interest and consideration to the success of this pious enterprize, carried so little the appearance of fanctity in his conduct, that Fulk, curate of Neuilly, a zealous preacher of the crusade, who from that merit had acquired the privilege of speaking the boldest truths, advised him to rid himself of his notorious vices, particularly his pride, avarice, and voluptuousness, which he called the king's three favourite daughters. You counsel well, replied Richard; and I hereby dispose of the first to the Templars, of the second to the Benedictines, and of the third to my prelates.

RICHARD, jealous of attempts which might be made on England during his absence, laid prince John, as well as his natural brother Geoffrey, archbishop of York, under engagements, confirmed by their oaths, that neither of them should enter the kingdom till his return; though he thought proper, before his departure, to withdraw this prohibition. The administration was left in the hands of Hugh, bishop of Durham, and of Longchamp, bishop of Ely, whom he appointed justiciaries and guardians of the realm. The latter was a Frenchman of mean birth, and of a violent character; who by art and address

f Hoveden, p. 662. Rymer, vol. i. p. 64. M. West. p. 257.

1189.

had infinuated himself into favour, whom Richard had C H A P. created chancellor, and whom he had engaged the pope also to invest with the legantine authority, that, by centering every kind of power in his person, he might the better ensure the public tranquillity. All the military and turbulent spirits flocked about the person of the king, and were impatient to distinguish themselves against the infidels in Afia; whither his inclinations, his engagements, led him, and whither he was impelled by messages from the king of France, ready to embark in this enterprize.

THE emperor Frederic, a prince of great spirit and conduct, had already taken the road to Palestine at the head of 150,000 men, collected from Germany and all the northern states. Having surmounted every obstacle thrown in his way by the artifices of the Greeks and the power of the infidels, he had penetrated to the borders of Syria; when, bathing in the cold river Cydnus, during the greatest heat of the summer-season, he was seized with a mortal distemper, which put an end to his life and his rash enterprize s. His army, under the command of his fon Conrade, reached Palestine; but was so diminished by fatigue, famine, maladies, and the fword, that it fearcely amounted to eight thousand men; and was unable to make any progress against the great power, valour, and conduct of Saladin. These reiterated calamities, attending the crusades, had taught the kings of France and England the necessity of trying another road to the Holy Land; and they determined to conduct their armies thither by fea, to carry provisions along with them, and by means of their naval power to maintain an open communication with their own states, and with the western parts of Europe. The place of rendezvous was appointed in the plains of Vezelay, on the borders of Burgundy h:

combined army amount to 100,000 men; a mighty force, animated with glory and religion, conducted by two war-like monarchs, provided with every thing which their feveral dominions could supply, and not to be overcome but by their own misconduct, or by the unsurmountable obstacles of nature.

King fets out on the crusade. THE French prince and the English here reiterated their promises of cordial friendship, pledged their faith not to invade each other's dominions during the crusade, mutually exchanged the oaths of all their barons and prelates to the same effect, and subjected themselves to the penalty of interdicts and excommunications, if they should ever violate this public and solemn engagement. They then separated; Philip took the road to Genoa, Richard that to Marseilles, with a view of meeting their sleets, which were severally appointed to rendezvous in these harbours. They put to sea; and nearly about the same time, were obliged, by stress of weather, to take shelter in Messina, where they were detained during the whole winter. This incident laid the soundation of animosities, which proved fatal to their enterprize.

44th Sept.

RICHARD and Philip were, by the fituation and extent of their dominions, rivals in power; by their age and inclinations, competitors for glory; and these causes of emulation, which, had the princes been employed in the field against the common enemy, might have stimulated them to martial enterprizes, soon excited, during the present leisure and repose, quarrels between monarchs of such a fiery character. Equally haughty, ambitious, intrepid, and inflexible; they were irritated with the least appearance of injury, and were incapable, by mutual condescensions, to efface those causes of complaint, which unavoidably arose between them. Richard, candid, fin-

i Vinisauf, p. 305.

on every occasion, to the designs of his antagonist; who, provident, interested, intriguing, failed not to take all advantages against him: And thus, both the circumstances of their disposition in which they were similar, and those in which they differed, rendered it impossible for them to persevere in that harmony, which was so necessary to the success of their undertaking.

THE last king of Sicily and Naples was William II. Transacwho had married Joan, fifter to Richard, and who, dy-Sicily. ing without iffue, had bequeathed his dominions to his paternal aunt, Constantia, the only legitimate descendant surviving of Roger, the first sovereign of those states who had been honoured with the royal title. This princess had, in expectation of that rich inheritance, been married to Henry VI. the reigning emperor k; but Tancred, her natural brother, had fixed fuch an interest among the barons, that, taking advantage of Henry's absence, he had acquired possession of the throne, and maintained his claim, by force of arms, against all the efforts of the Germans 1. The approach of the crusaders naturally gave him apprehensions for his unstable government; and he was uncertain, whether he had most reason to dread the presence of the French or of the English monarch. Philip was engaged in a strict alliance with the emperor his competitor: Richard was difgusted by his rigors towards the queen-dowager, whom the Sicilian prince had confined in Palermo; because she had opposed with all her interest his succession to the crown. Tancred, therefore, fensible of the present necessity, resolved to pay court to both these formidable princes; and he was not unsuccessful in his endeavours. He perfuaded Philip that it was highly improper for him to interrupt his enterprize against the infidels, by any attempt against a Christian state: He

* Bened, Abb. p. 580.

1 Hoveden, p. 663.

e H A P. reffored queen Joan to her liberty; and even found means ___ to make an alliance with Richard, who flipulated by treaty to marry his nephew, Arthur, the young duke of Britanny, to one of the daughters of Tancred m. But before these terms of friendship were settled, Richard, jealous both of Tancred and of the inhabitants of Meffina. had taken up his quarters in the fuburbs, and had poffeffed himself of a small fort, which commanded the harbour; and he kept himfelf extremely on his guard against ad October, their enterprizes. The citizens tock umbrage. Mutual infults and attacks passed between them and the English: Philip, who had quartered his troops in the town, endeavoured to accommodate the quarrel, and held a conference with Richard for that purpose. While the two kings, meeting in the open fields, were engaged in discourse on this Subject, a body of those Sicilians seemed to be drawing towards them; and Richard pushed forwards, in order to enquire into the reason of this extraordinary movement ". The English, infolent from their power, and inflamed with former animofities, wanted but a pretence for attacking the Messinese: They soon chaced them off the field, drove them into the town, and entered with them at the gates. The king employed his authority to reffrain them from pillaging and massacring the defenceless inhabitants; but he gave orders, in token of his victory, that the standard of England should be erected on the walls. who confidered that place as his quarters, exclaimed against the infult, and ordered some of his troops to pull down the standard: But Richard informed him by a meffenger, that, though he himself would willingly remove that ground of offence, he would not permit it to be done by others; and if the French king attempted fuch an infult upon him, he should not succeed but by the utmost m Hoveden, p. 676, 677. Bened. Abb. p. 615. a Bened. Abb. p. 608.

11914

effusion of blood. Philip, content with this species of C H A P. haughty submission, recalled his orders o: The difference was seemingly accommodated; but still left the remains of rancour and jealousy in the breasts of the two monarchs.

TANCRED, who, for his own security, desired to inflame their mutual hatred, employed an artifice, which might have been attended with consequences still more stall. He showed Richard a letter, signed by the French king, and delivered tohim, as he pretended, by the duke of Burgundy; in which that monarch desired Tancred to sall upon the quarters of the English, and promised to affish him in putting them to the sword, as common enemies. The unwary kichard gave credit to the information; but was too candid not to betray his discontent to Philip, who absolutely denied the letter, and charged the Sicilian prince with forgery and salsehood. Richard either was, or pretended to be, entirely satisfied P.

LEST these jealousies and complaints should multiply between them, it was proposed, that they should, by a folemn treaty, obviate all future differences, and adjust every point that could possibly hereafter become a controverfy between them. But this expedient flarted a new dispute, which might have proved more dangerous than any of the foregoing, and which deeply concerned the honour of Philip's family. When Richard, in every treaty with the late king, infifted fo strenuously on being allowed to marry Alice of France, he had only fought a pretence for quarrelling; and never meant to take to his bed a prince's fufrected of a criminal amour with his own father. After he became master, he no longer spake of that alliance: He even took measures for espousing Berengaria, daughter of Sanchez, king of Navarre, with whom he had become enamoured during his abode in

Guienne:

[•] Hoveden, p. 674. P Ibid. p. 688. Bened. Abb. p. 642, 643. Brompton, p. 1195.

CHAP. Guienne 9: Queen Eleanor was daily expected with that princess at Messina : and when Philip renewed to him his applications for espousing his fifter Alice, Richard was 2191. obliged to give him an absolute refusal. It is pretended by Hoveden and other historians, that he was able to produce fuch convincing proofs of Alice's infidelity, and even of her having born a child to Henry, that her brother defifted from his applications, and chose to wrap up the dishonour of his family in silence and oblivion. It is certain, from the treaty itself, which remains t, that, whatever were his motives, he permitted Richard to give his hand to Berengaria; and having fettled all other controversies with that prince, he immediately set fail for the Holy Land. Richard awaited some time the arrival of his mother and bride; and when they joined him, he feparated his fleet into two fquadrons, and fet forward on his enterprize. Queen Eleanor returned to England; but Berengaria, and the queen-dowager of Sicily, his fifter, attended him on the expedition ".

The English fleet, on leaving the port of Messina, met with a surious tempest; and the squadron, on which the two princesses were embarked, was driven on the tath April. coast of Cyprus, and some of the vessels were wrecked near Limisso in that island. Isaac, prince of Cyprus, who assumed the magnificent title of emperor, pillaged the ships that were stranded, threw the seamen and passengers into prison, and even resused to the princesses liberty, in their dangerous situation, of entering the harbour of Limisso. But Richard, who arrived soon after, took ample vengeance on him for the injury. He disembarked his troops; deseated the tyrant, who opposed his landing; entered Limisso by storm; gained next day a second victory; obliged Isaac to surrender at discretion;

9 Vinisaus. p. 316.

r M. Paris, p. 112. Trivet, p. 102. W. Heming. p. 519.

s Hoveden, p. 683.

t Rymer, vol. i. p. 69. Chron. de Dunst. p. 44.

u Bened. Abb. p. 644.

and

to

ıĉ

and established governors over the island. The Greek C H A P. prince, being thrown into prison and loaded with irons, complained of the little regard with which he was treated:

Upon which, Richard ordered filver setters to be made for him; and this emperor, pleased with the distinction, expressed a sense of the generosity of his conqueror w.

The king here espoused Berengaria, who, immediately 12th May. embarking, carried along with her to Palestine the daughter of the Cypriot prince; a dangerous rival, who was believed to have seduced the affections of her husband. Such were the libertine character and conduct of the heroes engaged in this pious enterprize!

THE English army arrived in time to partake in the The king's glory of the siege of Acre or Ptolemais, which had been Palestine, attacked for above two years by the united force of all the Christians in Palestine, and had been defended by the utmost efforts of Saladin and the Saracens. The remains of the German army, conducted by the emperor Frederic, and the separate bodies of adventurers who continually poured in from the West, had enabled the king of Jerusalem to form this important enterprize *: But Saladin, having thrown a strong garrison into the place under the command of Caracos, his own master in the art of war, and molesting the besiegers with continual attacks and fallies, had protracted the fuccess of the enterprize, and wasted the force of his enemies. The arrival of Philip and Richard inspired new life into the Christians; and these princes, acting by concert, and sharing the honour and danger of every action, gave hopes of a final victory over the infidels. They agreed on this plan of operations: When the French monarch attacked the town, the English guarded the trenches: Next day, when the English prince conducted the affault, the French

W Bened. Abb. p. 650. Ann. Waverl. p. 164. Vinisauf. p. 328. W. Heming. p. 523. X Vin. sauf. p. 269. 272. 279.

leftine.

C H A P. fucceeded him in providing for the fafety of the affailants. The emulation between those rival kings and rival nations produced extraordinary acts of valour: Richard in par-1191. ticular, animated with a more precipitate courage than Philip, and more agreeable to the romantic spirit of that age, drew to himself the general attention, and acquired a great and fplendid reputation. But this harmony was of fhort duration; and occasions of discord foon arose between these jealous and haughty princes.

State of Pa- THE family of Bouillon, which had first been placed on the throne of Jerusalem, ending in a female, Fulk, count of Anjou, grandfather to Henry II. of England. married the heiress of that kingdom, and transmitted his title to the younger branches of his family. The Anievin race ending also in a female, Guy de Lusignan, by espousing Sibylla, the heiress, had succeeded to the title: and though he loft his kingdom by the invafion of Saladin, he was still acknowledged by all the Christians for king of Jerusalem v. But as Sibylla died without issue, during the fiege of Acre, Isabella, her younger fifter, put in her claim to that titular kingdom, and required Lufignan to refign his pretenfions to her hufband, Conrade, marquis of Montserrat. Lufignan, maintaining that the royal title was unalienable and indefeazable, had recourse to the protection of Richard, attended on him before he left Cyprus, and engaged him to embrace his cause 2. There needed no other reason for throwing Philip into the party of Conrade; and the opposite views of these great monarchs brought faction and diffention into the Christian army, and retarded all its operations. The Templars, the Genoese, and the Germans, declared for Philip and Conrade; the Flemings, the Pifans, the knights of the hospital of St. John, adhered to Richard

> y Vinisauf. p. 281. W. Heming. p. 524.

z Trivet, p. 104. Vinisauf. p. 342.

and Lusignan. But notwithstanding these disputes, as C H A P. the length of the siege had reduced the Saracen garrison to the last extremity, they surrendered themselves prisoners; stipulated, in return for their lives, other advantages to the Christians, such as restoring of the Christian prisoners, and the delivery of the wood of the true cross a; and this great enterprize, which had long engaged the attention of all Europe and Asia, was at last, after the loss of 300,000 men, brought to a happy period.

But Philip, instead of pursuing the hopes of farther conquest, and of redeeming the holy city from slavery, being difgusted with the ascendant assumed and acquired by Richard, and having views of many advantages, which he might reap by his presence in Europe, declared his refolution of returning to France; and he pleaded his bad state of health as an excuse for his desertion of the common cause. He left, however, to Richard ten thoufand of his troops, under the command of the duke of Burgundy; and he renewed his oath never to commence hostilities against that prince's dominions during his abfence. But he had no fooner reached Italy than he applied, 'tis pretended, to pope Celestine III. for a dispensation from this vow; and when denied that request, he still proceeded, though after a covert manner, in a project, which the present situation of England rendered inviting, and which gratified, in an eminent degree, both his refentment and his ambition.

IMMEDIATELY after Richard had left England, and Diforders in begun his march to the holy land, the two prelates, England, whom he had appointed guardians of the realm, broke out into animofities against each other, and threw the king-

a This true cross was lost in the battle of Tiberiade, to which it had been carried by the crusaders for their protection. Rigord, an author of that age, fays, that after this dismal event, all the children who were born throughout all Christendom, had only twenty or twenty-two teeth, instead of thirty or thirty-two, which was their former complement, p. 14.

C H A P. dom into combustion. Longchamp, presumptuous in his nature, elated by the favour which he enjoyed with his master, and armed with the legantine commission, could not submit to an equality with the bishop of Durham: He even went fo far as to arrest his colleague, and to extort from him a refignation of the earldom of Northumberland, and of his other dignities, as the price of his liberty b. The king, informed of these diffentions, ordered, by letters from Marseilles, that the bishop should be reinstated in his offices; but Longchamp had still the boldness to refuse compliance, on pretence that he himself was better acquainted with the king's secret intentions c. He proceeded to govern the kingdom by his fole authority; to treat all the nobility with arrogance; and to display his power and riches with an invidious oftentation. He never travelled without a ftrong guard of fifteen hundred foreign foldiers, collected from that licentious tribe, with which the age was generally infested: Nobles and knights were proud of being admitted into his train: His retinue wore the aspect of royal magnificence: And when, in his progress through the kingdom, he lodged in any monastery, his attendants, it is faid, were fufficient to devour, in one night, the revenue of several years d. The king, who was detained in Europe longer than the haughty prelate expected, hearing of this oftentation, which exceeded even what the habits of that age indulged in ecclefiaftics; being also informed of the insolent, tyrannical conduct of his minister; thought proper to restrain his power: He sent new orders, appointing Walter archbishop of Rouen, William Mareshal earl of Strigul, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, William Briewere, and Hugh Bardolf, counsellors to Longchamp, b Hoveden, p. 665. Knyghton, p. 2403. c W. Heming. p. 528. d Hoveden, p. 680. Bened, Abb. p. 626, 700. Bromp-ton, p. 1193.

th

1-le,

ce

15,

2d

nat

e :

A-

19

g

1191,

and commanding him to take no measure of importance C H A P. without their concurrence and approbation. But fuch general terror had this man impressed by his violent conduct, that even the archbishop of Rouen and the earl of Strigul durst not produce this mandate of the king's: and Longchamp still maintained an uncontrouled authority over the nation. But when he proceeded fo far as to throw into prison Geoffrey archbishop of York, who had opposed his measures, this breach of ecclesiastical privileges excited fuch an universal ferment, that prince John, difgusted with the small share he possessed in the government, and perfonally disobliged by Longchamp, ventured to fummon at Reading a general council of the nobility and prelates, and cite him to appear before them. Longchamp thought it dangerous to entrust his person in their hands, and he shut himself up in the Tower of London; but being foon obliged to furrender that fortrefs, he fled beyond sea, concealed under a female habit, and was deprived of his offices of chancellor and chief jufficiary: the last of which was conferred on the archbishop of Rouen, a prelate of prudence and moderation. The commission of legate, however, which had been renewed to Longchamp by pope Celestine, still gave him, notwithstanding his absence, great authority in the kingdom, enabled him to diffurb the government, and forwarded the views of Philip, who watched every opportunity of annoying Richard's dominions. That monarch first attempted to carry open war into Normandy; but as the French nobility refused to follow him in an invasion of a state which they had sworn to protect, and as the pope, who was the general guardian of all princes that had taken the cross, threatened him with ecclesiastical censures, he defifted from his enterprize, and employed against England the expedient of fecret policy and intrigue. He debauched prince John from his allegiance; promised him his fifter Alice in marriage; offered to give him VOL. II. possession had not the authority of queen Eleanor, and the menaces of the English council, prevailed over the inclinations of that turbulent prince, he was ready to have crossed the feas, and to have put in execution his criminal enterprizes.

1192.

The king's heroic actions in Palestine.

THE jealoufy of Philip was every moment excited by the glory, which the great actions of Richard were gaining him in the east, and which, being compared to his own defertion of that popular cause, threw a double lustre on his rival. His envy, therefore, prompted him to obscure that fame, which he had not equalled; and he embraced every pretence of throwing the most violent and most improbable calumnies on the king of England. There was a petty prince in Asia, commonly called The old man of the mountain, who had acquired fuch an afcendant over his fanatical subjects, that they paid the most implicit deference to his commands; efteemed affaffination meritorious, when fanctified by his mandate; courted danger, and even certain death, in the execution of his orders; and fancied, that when they facrificed their lives for his fake, the highest joys of paradise were the infallible reward of their devoted obedience c. It was the custom of this prince, when he imagined himself injured, to difpatch fecretly some of his subjects against the aggressor. to charge them with the execution of his revenge, to instruct them in every art of disguising their purpose; and no precaution was fufficient to guard any man, however powerful, against the attempts of these subtle and determined ruffians. The greatest monarchs stood in awe of this prince of the affaffins, (for that was the name of his people; whence the word has passed into most European languages) and it was the highest indiscretion in Conrade, marquis of Montferrat, to offend and

e W. Heming, p. 532. Brompton, p. 1243.

es

of

n-nis

ent

old

int

ri-

er,

6.

to

1-

e

1192.

affront him. The inhabitants of Tyre, who were governed C H A P. by that nobleman, had put to death fome of this dangerous people: The prince demanded satisfaction; for as he piqued himself on never beginning any offence f, he had his regular and established formalities in requiring atonement: Conrade treated his messengers with disdain: The prince issued the fatal orders: Two of his subjects, who had infinuated themselves in disguise among Conrade's guards, openly, in the streets of Sidon, wounded him mortally; and when they were feized and put to the most cruel tortures, they triumphed amidst their agonies, and rejoiced that they had been destined by heaven to fuffer in so just and meritorious a cause.

EVERY one in Palestine knew from what hand the blow came. Richard was entirely free from fuspicion. Though that monarch had formerly maintained the cause of Lufignan against Conrade, he had become fensible of the bad effects attending those diffentions, and had voluntarily conferred on the former the kingdom of Cyprus, on condition that he should refign to his rival all pretenfions on the crown of Jerusalem 8. Conrade himself. with his dying breath, had recommended his widow to the protection of Richard h; the prince of the affaffins avowed the action in a formal narrative which he fent to Europe i; yet, on this foundation, the king of France thought fit to build the most egregious calumnies, and to impute to Richard the murder of the marguis of Montferrat, whose elevation he had once openly opposed. He filled all Europe with exclamations against the crime; appointed a guard for his own person, in order to defend himself against a like attempt k; and endeavoured, by these shallow artifices, to cover the infamy of attack-

f Rymer, vol. i. p. 71. g Vinisauf. p. 391. h Brompton, i Rymer, vol. i. p. 71. Trivet, p. 124. W. Heming. p. 544. Diceto, p. 680. k W. Heming. p. 532. Brompton, P. 1245.

C H A P ing the dominions of a prince, whom he himself had X. deserted, and who was engaged with so much glory in a 1192. war, universally acknowledged to be the common cause of Christendom.

Bur Richard's heroic actions in Palestine were the best apology for his conduct. The Christian adventurers under his command determined, on opening the campaign, to attempt the fiege of Afcalon, in order to prepare the way for that of Jerusalem; and they marched along the fea-coast with that intention. Saladin purposed to intercept their passage; and he placed himself on the road with an army, amounting to 300,000 combatants. On this occasion was fought one of the greatest battles of that age; and the most celebrated, for the military genius of the commanders, for the number and valour of the troops, and for the great variety of events which attended it. Both the right wing of the Christians, commanded by d'Avefnes, and the left, conducted by the duke of Burgundy, were, in the beginning of the day, broken and defeated; when Richard, who led on the main body, restored the battle; attacked the enemy with intrepidity and presence of mind; performed the part both of a confummate general and gallant foldier; and not only gave his two wings leifure to recover from their confusion, but obtained a complete victory over the Saracens, of whom forty thousand are said to have perished in the field 1. Ascalon foon after fell into the hands of the Christians: Other fieges were carried on with equal fuccefs: Richard was even able to advance within fight of Terusalem, the object of his enterprize; when he had the mortification to find, that he must abandon all hopes of immediate success, and must put a stop to his career of victory. The crusaders, animated with an en-thufiaftic ardor for the holy wars, broke at first through C H A P. all regards to fafety or interest in the prosecution of their purpose; and trusting to the immediate assistance of heaven, fet nothing before their eyes but fame and victory in this world, and a crown of glory in the next. But long absence from home, fatigue, disease, want, and the variety of incidents which naturally attend war, had gradually abated that fury, which nothing was able directly to withstand; and every one, except the king of England, expressed a desire of speedily returning into Europe. The Germans and the Italians declared their refolution of defishing from the enterprize: The French were still more obstinate in this purpose: The duke of Burgundy, in order to pay court to Philip, took all opportunities of mortifying and opposing Richard m: And there appeared an absolute necessity of abandoning for the present all hopes of farther conquest, and of securing the acquifitions of the Christians by an accommodation with Saladin. Richard, therefore, concluded a truce with that monarch; and stipulated, that Acre, Joppa, and other feaport towns of Palestine, should remain in the hands of the Christians, and that every one of that religion should have liberty to perform his pilgrimage to Jerusalem unmolested. This truce was concluded for three years, three months, three weeks, three days, and three hours; a magical number, which had probably been devised by the Europeans, and which was suggested by a fuperstition well suited to the object of the war.

¹ Hoveden, p. 698. Bened. Abb. p. 677. Diceto, p. 662. Brompton, p. 1214.

1192.

THE liberty, in which Saladin indulged the Christians, to perform their pilgrimages to Jerusalem, was an easy facrifice on his part; and the furious wars, which he waged in defence of the barren territory of Judea, were not with him, as with the European adventurers, the refult of fuperstition, but of policy. The advantage indeed of m Vinisauf. p. 380.

C H A P. science, moderation, humanity, was at that time entirely on the fide of the Saracens; and this gallant emperor, 1:92. in particular, displayed, during the course of the war, a fpirit and generofity, which even his bigotted enemies were obliged to acknowledge and admire. Richard, equally martial and brave, carried with him more of the barbarian character; and was guilty of acts of ferocity, which threw a stain on his celebrated victories. When Saladin refused to ratify the capitulation of Acre, the king of England ordered all his prisoners, to the number of five thousand, to be butchered; and the Saracens found themselves obliged to retaliate upon the Christians by a like cruelty ". Saladin died at Damascus soon after concluding this truce with the princes of the crufade: It is memorable, that, before he expired, he ordered his winding-sheet to be carried as a standard through every street of the city; while a crier went before, and proclaimed with a loud voice, This is all that remains to the mighty Saladin, the conqueror of the East. By his last will, he ordered charities to be distributed to the poor, without distinction of Jew, Christian, or Mahometan.

The king's return from Palestine.

THERE remained, after the truce, no business of importance to detain Richard in Palestine; and the intelligence which he received, concerning the intrigues of his brother John, and those of the king of France, made him sensible, that his presence was necessary in Europe. As he dared not to pass through France, he sailed to the Adriatic; and being shipwrecked near Aquileia, he put on the disguise of a pilgrim, with a purpose of taking his journey secretly through Germany. Pursued by the governor of Istria, he was forced out of the direct road to England, and was obliged to pass by Vienna; where his expences and liberalities betrayed the monarch in the n Hoveden, p. 697. Bened. Abb. p. 673. M. Paris, p. 125. Vinisauf. p. 346. W. Heming, p. 531.

ntirely nperor. war, a enemies ichard. e of the erocity,

When cre, the number aracens

on after ade: It red his h every nd pro-

is to the ft will, without of imintelliof his de him urope,

to the e put aking y the road where n the

nilauf,

habit of the pilgrim; and he was arrested by orders of C H A P. Leopold, duke of Austria. This prince had served under Richard at the si ge of Acre; but being disgusted by some infult of that haughty monarch, he was fo ungenerous as cember. to feize the present opportunity of gratifying at once his avarice and revenge; and he threw the king into prison. The emperor Henry VI. who also considered Richard as an enemy, on account of the alliance contracted by him with Tancred, king of Sicily, dispatched messengers to the duke of Austria, required the royal captive to be delivered to him, and stipulated a large sum of money as a reward for this fervice. Thus the king of England, Captivity in who had filled the whole world with his renown, found Germany. himself, during the most critical state of his affairs, confined in a dungeon, and loaded with irons, in the heart of Germany o, and entirely at the mercy of his enemies, the basest and most fordid of mankind.

THE English council was astonished on receiving this fatal intelligence; and forefaw all the dangerous confequences, which might naturally arise from that event. The queen-dowager wrote reiterated letters to pope Celestine; exclaiming against the injury which her son had fustained, representing the impiety of detaining in prison the most illustrious prince that had yet carried the banners of Christ into the Holy Land; claiming the protection of the apostolic see, which was due even to the meanest of those adventurers; and upbraiding the pope, that, in a cause where justice, religion, and the dignity of the church, were fo much concerned; a cause which it might well befit his holiness himself to support by taking in person a journey to Germany, the spiritual thunders should fo long be suspended over those facrilegious offenders P. The zeal of Celestine corresponded not to the o Chron. T. Wykes, p. 35.

P Rymer, vol. i. p. 72, 73, 74, 75,

76, &c.

impatience

C H A P. impatience of the queen-mother; and the regency of Engx. land were, for a long time, left to struggle alone with all their domestic and foreign enemies.

War with France.

THE king of France, quickly informed of Richard's confinement by a message from the emperor 9, prepared himself to take advantage of the incident: and he employed every means of force and intrigue, of war and negotiation, against the dominions and the person of his unfortunate rival. He revived the calumny of Richard's affaffinating the marquis of Montferrat; and by that abfurd pretence, he induced his barons to violate their oaths, by which they had engaged, that, during the crufade, they never would, on any account, attack the dominions of the king of England. He made the emperor the largest offers, if he would deliver into his hands the royal prifoner, or at least detain him in perpetual captivity: He even formed an alliance by marriage with the king of Denmark, defired that the ancient Danish claim to the crown of England should be transferred to him, and folicited a fupply of shipping to maintain it. But the most fuccessful of Philip's negotiations was with prince John, who, forgetting every tye to his brother, his fovereign, and his benefactor, thought of nothing but how to make his own advantage of the public calamities. That traitor, on the first invitation from the court of France, suddenly went abroad, had a conference with Philip, and made a treaty, of which the object was the perpetual ruin of his unhappy brother, He flipulated to deliver into Philip's hands a great part of Normandy'; he received, in return, the investiture of all Richard's transmarine dominions; and it is reported by feveral historians, that he even did homage to the French king for the crown of England.

In confequence of this treaty, Philip invaded Normandy; and by the treachery of John's emissaries, made

hit

Eng-

th all

nard's

e em-

id ne-

of his

at ab-

l pri-

: He

ng of

o the

foli-

most

ohn,

eign,

nake

itor,

his

ip's

ırn,

did

01ade 1193.

himself master, without opposition, of many fortresses, C H A P. Neuf-chatel, Neausle, Gifors, Pacey, Ivreé: He subdued the counties of Eu and Aumale; and advancing to form the fiege of Rouen, he threatened to put all the inhabitants to the fword, if they dared to make refistance. Happily, Robert earl of Leicester appeared in that critical moment; a gallant nobleman, who had acquired great honour during the crufade, and who, being more fortunate than his mafter in finding his passage homewards. took on him the command in Rouen, and exerted himself, by his exhortations and example, to infuse courage into the difmayed Normans. Philip was repulfed in every attack; the time of fervice from his vaffals expired; and he confented to a truce with the English regency, received in return the promife of 20,000 marks, and had four castles put into his hands, as fecurity for the payment s.

PRINCE John, who, with a view of encreasing the general confusion, went over to England, was still less fuccessful in his enterprizes. He was only able to make himself master of the castles of Windsor and Wallingsord; but when he arrived in London, and claimed the kingdom as heir to his brother, of whose death he pretended to have received certain intelligence, he was rejected by all the barons, and measures were taken to oppose and fubdue him t. The justiciaries, supported by the general affection of the people, provided fo well for the defence of the kingdom, that John was obliged, after some fruitless efforts, to conclude a truce with them; and before its expiration, he thought it prudent to return into France, where he openly avowed his alliance with Philip ".

MEAN while, the high spirit of Richard suffered in Germany every kind of infult and indignity. The French

s Hoveden, p. 730, 731. Rymer, vol. i. p. 81. 4 W. Heming. p. 536. P. 734.

t Hoveden.

C H A P. ambassadors, in their master's name, renounced him as a vassal to the crown of France, and declared all his fiefs to be forfeited to his liege-lord. The emperor, that he might render him more impatient for the recovery of his liberty, and make him submit to the payment of a larger ransom, treated him with the greatest severity, and reduced him to a condition worse than that of the meanest malefactor. He was even produced before the diet of the empire at Worms, and accused by Henry of many crimes and misdemeanors; of making an alliance with Tancred, the usurper of Sicily; of turning the arms of the Crusade against a Christian prince, and subduing Cyprus; of affronting the duke of Austria before Acre; of obstructing the progress of the Christian arms by his quarrels with the king of France; of affaffinating Conrade, marquis of Montferrat; and of concluding a truce with Saladin, and leaving Terufalem in the hands of the Saracen emperor w. Richard, whose spirit was not broken by his misfortunes, and whose genius was rather rouzed by these frivolous or fcandalous imputations; after premifing, that his dignity exempted him from answering before any jurisdiction, except that of heaven; yet condescended, for the sake of his reputation, to justify his conduct before that great affembly. He observed, that he had no hand in Tancred's elevation, and only concluded a treaty with a prince, whom he found in possession of the throne: That the king, or rather tyrant of Cyprus, had provoked his indignation by the most ungenerous and unjust proceedings; and though he chaftised this aggressor, he had not retarded a moment the progress of his chief enterprize: That if he had at any time been wanting in civility to the duke of Austria, he had already been sufficiently punished for that fally of paffion; and it better became men, embarked together in fo holy a cause, to forgive each other's

w M. Paris, p. 121. W. Heming. p. 536.

infirmities, than to pursue a slight offence with such unre- C H A P. Jenting vengeance: That it had fufficiently appeared by the event, whether the king of France or he were most zealous for the conquest of the Holy Land, and were most likely to facrifice private passions and animosities to that great object: That if the whole tenor of his life had not shown him incapable of a base affassination, and justified him from that imputation in the eyes of his very enemies, it was in vain for him, at present, to make his apology, or plead the many irrefragable arguments, which he could produce in his own favour: And that, however he might regret the necessity, he was so far from being ashamed of his truce with Saladin, that he rather gloried in that event; and thought it extremely honourable, that, though abandoned by all the world, supported only by his own courage and by the fmall remains of his national troops, he could yet obtain fuch conditions from the most powerful and most warlike emperor that the East had ever yet produced. Richard, after thus deigning to apologize for his conduct, burst out into indignation at the cruel treatment which he had met with; that he, the champion of the crofs, still wearing that honourable badge, should, after expending the blood and treasure of his subjects in the common cause of Christendom, be intercepted by Christian princes in his return to his own country, be thrown into a dungeon, be loaded with irons, be obliged to plead his cause, as if he were a subject and a malefactor; and what he still more regretted, be thereby prevented from making preparations for a new crufade, which he had projected, after the expiration of the truce, and from redeeming the sepulchre of Christ, which had so long been profaned by the dominion of infidels. The spirit and eloquence of Richard made fuch impression on the German princes, that they exclaimed loudly against the conduct of the emperor; the pope threatened him with excommunication; and Henry, who had hearkened to the proposals

n as a iefs to nat he

of his larger

nd reneanest

of the crimes

ncred.

is; of ucting

ith the uis of

n, and eror w.

ous or

ignity

ction, ake of great Tan-

ith a

That d his

ceed-

not ize:

o the

thed

em-

er's

les,

CHAP. posals of the king of France and prince John, found that it would be impracticable for him to execute his and their base purposes, or to detain the king of England any longer 1193-The king's in captivity. He therefore concluded with him a treaty delivery. for his ranfom, and agreed to restore him to his freedom for the fum of 150,000 marks, about 300,000 pounds of our present money: of which 100,000 marks were to be paid before he received his liberty, and fixty-feven hostages delivered for the remainder x. The emperor, as if to gloss over the infamy of this transaction, made at the fame time a present to Richard of the kingdom of Arles, comprehending Provence, Dauphiny, Narbonne, and other states, over which the empire had some antiquated claims; a present which the king very wifely neglected.

> THE captivity of the superior lord was one of the cases provided for by the feudal tenures; and all the vaffals were in that event obliged to give an aid for his ranfom. Twenty shillings were therefore levied on each knight's fee in England; but as this money came in slowly, and was not fufficient for the intended purpose, the voluntary zeal of the people readily supplied the deficiency. The churches and monasteries melted down their plate, to the amount of 30,000 marks; the bishops, abbots, and nobles, paid a fourth of their yearly rent; the parochial clergy contributed a tenth of their tythes: And the requisite sum being thus collected, queen Eleanor, and Walter archbishop of Rouen, set out with it for Germany; paid the money to the emperor and the duke of Austria at Mentz; delivered them hostages for the remainder; and freed Richard from captivity. His escape was very critical. Henry had been detected in the affaffination of the bishop of Liege, and in an attempt of a like nature on the duke of Louvaine; and finding himfelf extremely obnoxious to the German princes on account

$194. 4th Feb. po

d that their longer

treaty

eedom

nds of

e to be en ho-

, as if

at the

Arles,

, and

quated cted.

e cases

s were

nfom.

right's

, and

intary

The

to the

d no-

chial

ie re-

and

Ger-

duke

for

His

the the

ot of

im-

of

1194.

of these odious practices, he had determined to seek sup- C H A P. port from an alliance with the king of France; to detain -Richard, the enemy of that prince, in perpetual captivity; to keep in his hands the money which he had already received for his ranfom; and to extort fresh sums from Philip and prince John, who were very liberal in their offers to him. He therefore gave orders that Richard should be purfued and arrested; but the king, making all imaginable hafte, had already embarked at the mouth of the Schelde, and was out of fight of land, when the meffengers of the emperor reached Antwerp.

THE joy of the English was extreme on the appear- King's reance of their monarch, who had fuffered fo many cala-land. mities, who had acquired fo much glory, and who had 20th March, spread the reputation of their name into the farthest East, whither their fame had never before been able to extend. He gave them, foon after his arrival, an opportunity of publickly displaying their exultation, by ordering himself to be crowned anew at Winchester; as if he intended, by that ceremony, to reinstate himself in his throne, and to wipe off the ignominy of his captivity. Their fatisfaction was not damped, even when he declared his purpose of refuming all those exorbitant grants, which he had been necessitated to make before his departure for the Holy Land. The barons also, in a great council, confiscated, on account of his treason, all prince John's possessions in England; and they affifted the king in reducing the fortreffes which still remained in the hands of his brother's adherents y. Richard, having fettled every thing in England, passed over with an army into Normandy; being impatient to make war on Philip, and to revenge himfelf for the many injuries which he had received from that monarch z. As foon as Philip heard of the king's deli-

2 Hoveden, p. 740.

y Hoveden, p. 737. Ann. Waverl. p. 165. W. Heming. p. 540.

E H A P. verance from captivity, he wrote to his confederate, John, in these terms: Take care of yourself: The devil is broken loose 1.

War with France.

WHEN we consider such powerful and martial monarchs, inflamed with perfonal animofity against each other, enraged by mutual injuries, excited by rivalship, impelled by opposite interests, and instigated by the pride and violence of their own temper; our curiofity is naturally raifed, and we expect an obstinate and furious war, distinguished by the greatest events, and concluded by fome remarkable catastrophe. Yet are the incidents. which attended those hostilities, so frivolous, that scarce any historian can entertain such a passion for military descriptions as to venture on a detail of them: A certain proof of the extreme weakness of princes in those ages, and of the little authority they possessed over their refractory vassals! The whole amount of the exploits on both fides is, the taking of a castle, the surprise of a straggling party, a rencounter of horse, which resembles more a rout than a battle. Richard obliged Philip to raise the fiege of Verneüil; he took Loches, a small town in Anjou; he made himself master of Beaumont, and some other places of little consequence; and after these trivial exploits, the two kings began already to hold conferences for an accommodation. Philip infifted, that, if a general peace were concluded, the barons on each fide should for the future be prohibited from carrying on private wars against each other: But Richard replied, that this was a right claimed by his vaffals, and he could not debar them from it. After this fruitless negociation, there ensued an action between the French and English cavalry at Fretteval, in which the former were routed, and the king of France's cartulary and records, which commonly at that time attended his person, were taken. But this victory leading to no important advantages, a truce for a year C H A P. was at last, from mutual weakness, concluded between the two monarchs.

During this war, prince John deferted from Philip, threw himself at his brother's feet, craved pardon for his offences, and by the intercession of queen Eleanor, was received into favour. I forgive him, said the king, and hope I shall as easily forget his injuries, as he will my pardon. John was incapable even of returning to his duty, without committing a baseness. Before he left Philip's party, he invited to dinner all the officers of the garrison, which that prince had placed in the citadel of Evreux; he massacred them during the entertainment; fell, with the assistance of the townsmen, on the garrison, whom he put to the sword; and then delivered up the place to his brother.

THE king of France was the great object of Richard's refentment and animofity: The conduct of John, as well as that of the emperor and duke of Austria, had been fo base, and was exposed to such general odium and reproach, that the king deemed himself sufficiently revenged for their injuries; and he feems never to have entertained any project of vengeance against any of them. The duke of Austria about this time, having crushed his leg by the fall of his horse at a tournament, was thrown into a fever; and being flruck, on the approaches of death, with remorfe for his injustice to Richard, he ordered, by will, all the English hostages in his hands to be fet at liberty, and the remainder of the debt due to him to be remitted: His fon, who feemed inclined to difobey these orders, was constrained by his ecclesiastics to execute them b. The emperor also made advances for Richard's friendship, and offered to give him a discharge of all the debt, not yet paid to him, provided he

1195

C H A P. would enter into an offensive alliance against the king of France; a propofal which was very acceptable to Richard, and was greedily embraced by him. The treaty with the emperor took no effect; but it served to rekindle the war between France and England before the expiration of the truce. This war was not diftinguished by any more remarkable incidents than the foregoing. After mutually ravaging the open country, and taking a few infignificant castles, the two kings concluded a peace at Louviers. and made an exchange of some territories with each other. Their inability to wage war occasioned the peace: Their 1196. mutual antipathy engaged them again in war before two months expired. Richard imagined, that he had now found an opportunity of gaining great advantages over his rival, by forming an alliance with the counts of Flanders, Toulouse, Boulogne, Champagne, and other confiderable vaffals of the crown of France d. But he foon experienced the infincerity of those princes; and was not able to make any impression on that kingdom, while governed by a monarch of fo much vigour and activity as Philip. The most remarkable incident of this war was the taking prisoner in battle the bishop of Beauvais, a martial prelate, who was of the family of Dreux, and a near relation of the French king's. Richard, who hated that bishop, threw him into prison, and loaded him with frons; and when the pope demanded his liberty, and claimed him as his fon, the king fent to his holiness the coat of mail which the prelate had worn in battle, and which was all befmeared with blood: And he replied to him, in the terms employed by Jacob's fons to that patriarch, This have we found: Know now whether it be thy fon's coat or no c. This new war between England and France.

c Rymer, vol. i. p. 91. d W. Heming. p. 549. Brompton, p. 1273. Rymer, vol. i. p. 94. c Genesis, chap. xxxvii. ver. 32. M. Paris, p. 128. Brompton, p. 1273.

though carried on with fuch animofity, that both kings C H A P. frequently put out the eyes of their prisoners, was soon finished, by a truce of five years; and immediately after figning this treaty, the kings were ready, on fome new offence, to break out again into hostilities; when the mediation of the cardinal of St. Mary, the pope's legate, accommodated the difference f. This prelate even engaged the princes to commence a treaty for a more durable peace; but the death of Richard put an end to the negociation.

VIDOMAR, viscount of Limoges, a vassal of the king's, had found a treasure, of which he sent part to that prince as a present. Richard, as superior lord, claimed the whole; and at the head of fome Brabançons, befieged the viscount in the castle of Chalus, near Limoges, in order to make him comply with his demand s. garrison offered to furrender; but the king replied, that, fince he had taken the pains to come thither and befiege the place in person, he would take it by force, and would hang every one of them. The fame day, Richard, accompanied by Marcadée, leader of his Brabançons, approached the castle in order to survey it; when one Bertrand de Gourdon, an archer, took aim at him, and pierced his shoulder with an arrow. The king, however, 28thMarch. gave orders for the affault, took the place, and hanged all the garrison, except Gourdon, who had wounded him, and whom he referved for a more deliberate and more cruel execution h.

THE wound was not in itself dangerous; but the unskilfulness of the surgeon made it mortal: He so rankled Richard's shoulder in pulling out the arrow, that a gangrene enfued; and that prince was now fenfible that his life was drawing towards a period. He fent for Gour-

f Rymer, vol. i. p. 109, 110. P. 2413. Vol. II. h Ibid.

g Hoveden, p. 791. Knyghton,

don.

1199.

c H A P. don, and asked him, Wretch, what have I ever done to you, to oblige you to feek my life? — What have you done to me? replied coolly the prisoner: You killed with your own hands my father, and my two brothers; and you intended to have hanged myself: I am now in your power, and you may take revenge, by inflicting on me the most severe torments: But I shall endure them all with pleasure, provided I can think that I have been so happy as to rid the world of such a nuisance.

Richard, struck with the reasonableness of this reply, and humbled by the near approach of death, ordered Gourdon to be set at liberty, and a sum of money to be given him; but Marcadée, unknown to him, seized the unhappy man, stead him alive, and then hanged him.

Death

forty-second of his age; and he left no iffue behind and character of the king.

THE most shining part of this prince's character are his military talents. No man, even in that romantic age, carried personal courage and intrepidity to a greater height; and this quality gained him the appellation of the lion-hearted, cœur de lion. He paffionately loved glory, chiefly military glory; and as his conduct in the field was not inferior to his valour, he feems to have possessed every talent necessary for acquiring it. His refentments also were high; his pride unconquerable; and his fubjects, as well as his neighbours, had therefore reason to apprehend, from the continuance of his reign, a perpetual scene of blood and violence. Of an impetuous and vehement spirit, he was distinguished by all the good, as well as the bad qualities, incident to that character: He was open, frank, generous, fincere, and brave; he was revengeful, domineering, ambitious, haughty, and cruel; and was thus better calculated to dazzle men by the splendor of his enterprizes, than either to promote

i Hoveden, p. 791. Brompton, p. 1277. Knyghton, p. 2413.

IIQQ.

their happiness or his own grandeur, by a found and well C H A P. regulated policy. As military talents make great impreffion on the people, he feems to have been much beloved. by his English subjects; and he is remarked to have been the first prince of the Norman line that bore any fincere regard to them. He passed however only four months of his reign in that kingdom: The crufade employed him near three years; he was detained about fourteen months in captivity; the rest of his reign was spent either in war, or preparations for war, against France; and he was fo pleased with the same which he had acquired in the East, that he determined, notwithstanding his past misfortunes, to have farther exhausted his kingdom, and to have exposed himself to new hazards, by conducting another expedition against the infidels.

THOUGH the English pleased themselves with the glory Miscellanewhich the king's martial genius procured them, his reign ous transactions of this was very oppressive, and somewhat arbitrary, by the high reign. taxes which he levied on them, and often without confent of the states or great council. In the ninth year of his reign, he levied five shillings on each hyde of land; and because the clergy refused to contribute their share, he put them out of the protection of law, and ordered the civil courts to give them no fentence for any debts which they might claim k. Twice in his reign he ordered all his charters to be fealed anew, and the parties to pay fees for the renewal 1. It is faid that Hubert, his justiciary, fent him over to France, in the space of two years, no less a sum than 1,100,000 marks, besides bearing all the charges of the government in England. But this account is quite incredible, unless we suppose that Richard made a thorough dilapidation of the demesnes of the crown, which is not likely he could do with any advantage after his k Hoveden, p. 743. Tyrrel, vol. ii. p. 563. Vindic. tom. i. p. 1133.

1 Prynne's Chronol.

CHAP. former resumption of all grants. A king, who possess X. ed such a revenue, could never have endured fourteen months captivity, for not paying 150,000 marks to the emperor, and be obliged at last to leave hostages for a third of the fum. The prices of commodities in this reign are also a certain proof, that no such enormous sum could be levied on the people. A hyde of land, or about a hundred and twenty acres, was commonly let at twenty shillings a year, money of that time. As there were 243,600 hydes in England, it is easy to compute the amount of all the landed rents of the kingdom. The general and stated price of an ox was four shillings; of a labouring horse the same; of a sow, one shilling; of a sheep with fine wool, ten-pence; with coarse wool, fix-pence m. These commodities seem not to have advanced in their prices fince the conquest *, and to have still been ten times cheaper than at present.

RICHARD renewed the fevere laws against transgressors in his forests, whom he punished by castration and putting out their eyes, as in the reign of his great-grandfather. He established by law one weight and measure throughout his kingdom. A useful institution, which the mercenary disposition and necessities of his successor engaged him to dispense with for money.

THE disorders in London, derived from its bad police, had risen to a great height during this reign; and in the year 1196, there seemed to be formed so regular a conspiracy among the numerous malesactors, as threatened the city with destruction. There was one William Fitz-Osbert, commonly called Longbeard, a lawyer, who had rendered himself extremely popular among the lower rank of citizens; and by desending them on all occasions, had m Hoveden, p. 745.

n M. Paris, p. 109. 124.

Trivet, p. 127. Ann. Waverl. p. 165.

Hoveden, p. 774.

acquired the appellation of the advocate or faviour of CHAP. the poor. He exerted his authority, by injuring and infulting the more fubftantial citizens, with whom he lived in a state of hostility, and who were every moment exposed to the most outrageous violences from him and his licentious emissaries. Murders were daily committed in the streets; houses were broken open and pillaged in day-light; and it is pretended, that no less than fifty-two thousand persons had entered into an association, by which they bound themselves to obey all the orders of this dangerous ruffian. Archbishop Hubert, who was then chief justiciary, fummoned him before the council to answer for his conduct; but he came fo well attended, that no one durst accuse him, or give evidence against him; and the primate, finding the impotence of law, contented himself with exacting from the citizens hostages for their good behaviour. He kept, however, a watchful eye on Fitz-Osbert; and seizing a favourable opportunity, attempted to commit him to custody; but the criminal, murdering one of the public officers, escaped with his concubine to the church of St. Mary le Bow, where he defended himself by force of arms. He was at last forced from his retreat, condemned, and executed, amidst the regrets of the populace, who were fo devoted to his memory, that they stole his gibbet, paid the same veneration to it as to the cross, and were equally zealous in propagating and attesting reports of the miracles wrought by it o. But though the fecturies of this superstition were punished by the justiciary p, it received so little encouragement from the established clergy, whose property was endangered by fuch feditious practices, that it fuddenly funk and vanished.

o Hoveden, p. 765. Diceto, p. 691. Neubrig. p. 492, 493. P Gervase, p. 1551.

coats of arms was first introduced into Europe. The knights cased up in armour, had no way to make themfelves be known and distinguished in battle, but by the devices on their shields; and these were gradually adopted by their posterity and families, who were proud of the pious and military enterprizes of their ancestors.

KING Richard was a passionate lover of poetry: There even remain some poetical works of his composition: And he bears a rank among the Provençal poets or Trobadores, who were the first of the modern Europeans, that distinguished themselves by attempts of that nature.

CHAP.

CHAP. XI.

JOHN.

Accession of the king—His marriage—War with France—Murder of Arthur, duke of Britanny.

—The king expelled the French provinces
—The king's quarrel with the court of Rome
—Cardinal Langton appointed archbishop of Canterbury—Interdict of the kingdom—Excommunication of the king—The king's submission to the pope—Discontents of the barons—Insurrection of the barons—Magna Charta—Renewal of the civil wars—Prince Lewis called over—Death—and character of the king.

made the government of a fingle person be always regarded as a species of tyranny and usurpation, and regular monarchy, had rendered them entirely ignorant both of the rights of primogeniture and a representation in succession; inventions so necessary for preserving order in the lines of princes, for obviating the evils of civil discord and of usurpation, and for begetting moderation in that species of government, by giving security to the ruling sovereign. These innovations arose from the seudal law; which, first introducing the right of primogeniture, made such a distinction between the families of the elder and younger brothers, that the son

CHAP. of the former was thought entitled to fucceed to his grandfather, preferably to his uncles, though nearer allied to the deceased monarch. But though this progress of ideas was natural, it was gradual. In the age of which we treat, the practice of representation was indeed introduced, but not thoroughly established; and the minds of men fluctuated between opposite principles. Richard, when he entered on the holy war, declared his nephew, Arthur duke of Britanny, his fuccessor; and by a formal deed, he fet aside, in his favour, the title of his brother John, who was younger than Geoffrey, the father of that prince a. But John fo little acquiesced in that destination, that, when he gained the afcendant in the English ministry, by expelling Longchamp, the chancellor and great jufficiary, he engaged all the English barons to fwear, that they would maintain his right of fuccesfion; and Richard, on his return, took no steps towards restoring or securing the order which he had at first estabished. He was even careful, by his last will, to declare his brother John heir to all his dominions b; whether, that he now thought Arthur, who was only twelve years of age, incapable of afferting his claim against John's faction, or was influenced by Eleanor, the queen-mother, who hated Constantia, mother of the young duke, and who dreaded the credit which that princess would naturally acquire if her fon should mount the throne. The authority of a testament was great in that age, even where the fucceffion of a kingdom was concerned; and John had reason to hope, that this title, joined to his plausible right in other respects, would ensure him the succession. But the idea of representation seems to have made, at this time, greater progress in France than in England: The barons of the transmarine provinces, a Hoveden, p. 677. M. Paris, p. 112. Chron, de Dunft. p. 43. Rymer, vol. i. p. 66. 63. Bened. Abb. p. 519. b Hoyeden, p. 791. Trivet, p. 138.

Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, immediately declared in C H A P. favour of Arthur's title, and applied for affiftance to the French monarch as their fuperior lord. Philip, who defired only an occasion to embarrass John, and difmember his dominions, embraced the cause of the young duke of Britanny, took him under his protection, and fent him to Paris to be educated, along with his own fon Lewis c. In this emergence, John hastened to establish his authority in the chief members of the monarchy; and after fending Eleanor into Poictou and Guienne, where her right was incontestible, and was readily acknowledged, he hurried to Rouen, and having fecured the dutchy of Normandy, he passed over, without loss of time, to England. Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, William Marefchal, earl of Strigul, who also passes by the name of earl of Pembroke, and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the justiciary, the three most favoured ministers of the late king, were already engaged on his fide 4; and the fubmission or acquiescence of all the other barons put him, without opposition, in possession of the throne.

THE king foon returned to France, in order to conduct the war against Philip, and to recover the revolted provinces from his nephew, Arthur. The alliances, which Richard had formed with the earl of Flanders e, and other potent French princes, though they had not been very effectual, still subsisted, and enabled John to defend himself against all the efforts of his enemy. In an action between the French and Flemings, the elect bishop of Cambray was taken prisoner by the former; and when the cardinal of Capua claimed his liberty, Philip, instead of complying, reproached him with the weak efforts which he had employed in favour of the bishop of Beau-

e Hoveden, p. 792. M. Paris, p. 137. M. West. p. 263. Knyghton, d Hoveden, p. 793. M. Paris, p. 137. e Rymer, vol. i. p. 114. Hoveden, p. 794. M, Paris, p. 138.

C H A P. vais, who was in a like condition. The legate, to show his impartiality, laid at the same time the kingdom of France and the dutchy of Normandy under an interdict; and the two kings found themselves obliged to make an exchange of these military prelates.

1200.

NOTHING enabled the king to bring this war to a happy issue so much as the selfish, intriguing character of Philip, who acted in the provinces that had declared for Arthur, without any regard to the interests of that prince. Conftantia, seized with a violent jealousy, that he intended to usurp the entire dominion of them f, found means to carry off her fon fecretly from Paris: She put him into the hands of his uncle; restored the provinces which had adhered to the young prince; and made him do homage for the dutchy of Britanny, which was regarded as a rere-fief of Normandy. From this incident, Philip faw, that he could not hope to make any progress against John; and being threatened with an interdict on account of his irregular divorce from Ingelburga, the Danish princess, whom he had espoused, he became defirous of concluding a peace with England. After some fruitless conferences, the terms were at last adjusted; and the two monarchs seemed in this treaty to have an intention, besides ending the present quarrel, of preventing all future causes of discord, and of obviating every controverfy which could hereafter arife between them. They adjusted the limits of all their territories: mutually secured the interests of their vassals; and to render the union more durable, John gave his niece, Blanche of Castile, in marriage to prince Lewis, Philip's eldest son, and with her the baronies of Issoudun and Graçai, and other fiefs in Berri. Nine barons of the king of England, and as many of the king of France, were guarantees of this treaty; and all of them swore, CHAP.
that, if their sovereign violated any article of it, they would declare themselves against him, and embrace the cause of the injured monarch s.

JOHN, now fecure, as he imagined, on the fide of The King's France, indulged his passion for Isabella, the daughter and heir of Aymar Tailleffer, count of Angouleme, a lady with whom he had become much enamoured. His queen, the heiress of the family of Glocester, was still alive: Isabella was married to the count de la Marche, and was already configned to the care of that nobleman; though, by reason of her tender years, the marriage had not been consummated. The passion of John made him overlook all these obstacles: He persuaded the count of Angouleme to carry off his daughter from her husband; and having, on fome pretence or other, procured a divorce from his own wife, he espoused Isabella; regardless both of the menaces of the pope, who exclaimed against these irregular proceedings, and of the refentment of the injured count, who foon found means of punishing his powerful and infolent rival.

JOHN had not the art of attaching his barons either by affection or by fear. The count de la Marche, and his brother the count d'Eu, taking advantage of the general discontent against him, excited commotions in Poictou and Normandy; and obliged the king to have recourse to arms, in order to suppress the insurrection of his vassals. He summoned together the barons of England, and required them to pass the sea under his standard, and to quell the rebels: He sound that he possessed as little authority in that kingdom as in his transmarine provinces. The English barons unanimously replied, that they would not attend him on this expedition, unless he would pro-fymptom of a regular affociation and plan of liberty among those noblemen! But affairs were not yet fully ripe for the revolution projected. John, by menacing the barons, broke the concert; and both engaged many of them to follow him into Normandy, and obliged the rest, who staid behind, to pay him a scutage of two marks on each knight's fee, as the price of their exemption from the service.

8 Norman. Duchesnii, p. 1055. Rymer, vol. i. p. 117, 118, 119. Hoveden, p. 814. Chron. Dunst. vol. i. p. 47. ILOI.

THE force, which John carried abroad with him, and that which joined him in Normandy, rendered him much fuperior to his malcontent barons; and fo much the more, as Philip did not publickly give them any countenance, and feemed as yet determined to persevere steadily in the alliance, which he had contracted with England. But the king, elated with his fuperiority, advanced claims, which gave an universal alarm to his vastals, and diffused still wider the general discontent. As the jurisprudence of those times required, that the causes in the lord's court should chiefly be decided by duel, he carried along with him certain bravos, whom he retained as champions, and whom he destined to fight with his barons, in order to determine any controversy which he might raise against them i. The count de la Marche, and other noblemen, regarded this proceeding as an affront, as well as an injury; and declared, that they would never draw their fword against men of fuch inferior quality. The king menaced them with vengeance; but he had not vigour to employ against them the force in his hands, or to profecute the injustice, by crushing entirely the nobles who opposed it.

War with France. This government, equally feeble and violent, gave the injured barons courage as well as inclination to carry farther their opposition: They appealed to the king of 1202.

France; complained of the denial of justice in John's C H A P. court; demanded redrefs from him as their fuperior lord; and entreated him to employ his authority, and prevent their final ruin and oppression. Philip perceived his advantage, opened his mind to great projects, interposed in behalf of the French barons, and began to talk in a high and menacing ftyle to the king of England. John, who could not disavow Philip's authority, replied, that it belonged to himself first to grant them a trial by their peers in his own court; it was not till he failed in this duty. that he was answerable to his peers in the supreme court of the French king k; and he promised, by a fair and equitable judicature, to give fatisfaction to his barons. When the nobles, in consequence of this engagement, demanded a fafe-conduct, that they might attend his court. he at first refused it: Upon the renewal of Philip's menaces. he promised to grant their demand; he violated this promife; fresh menaces extorted from him a promise to furrender to Philip the fortreffes of Tillieres and Boutavant, as a fecurity for performance; he again violated this engagement; his enemies, fensible both of his weakness and want of faith, combined still closer in the resolution of pushing him to extremities; and a new and powerful ally foon appeared to encourage them in their invasion of this odious and despicable government.

THE young duke of Britanny, who was now rifing to man's estate, sensible of the dangerous character of his uncle, determined to feek both his fecurity and elevation by an union with Philip and the malcontent barons. He joined the French army, which had begun hostilities against the king of England: He was received with great marks of distinction by Philip; was knighted by him; espoused his daughter Mary; and was invested not only

C H A P. in the dutchy of Britanny, but in the counties of Anjou and Maine, which he had formerly refigned to his uncle 1. Every attempt fucceeded with the allies. Tillieres and Boutavant were taken by Philip, after making a feeble defence: Mortimar and Lyons fell into his hands almost without resistance. That prince next invested Gournai; and opening the fluices of a lake, which lay in the neighbourhood, poured fuch a torrent of water into the place. that the garrison deserted it, and the French monarch. without striking a blow, made himself master of that important fortress. The progress of the French arms was rapid, and promifed more confiderable fuccess than usually in that age attended military enterprizes. In answer to every advance which the king made towards peace, Philip still infifted, that he should refign all his transmarine dominions to his nephew, and rest contented with the kingdom of England; when an event happened, which feemed to turn the scales in favour of John, and to give him a decifive fuperiority over his enemies.

Young Arthur, fond of military renown, had broken into Poictou at the head of a small army; and passing near Mirebeau, he heard, that his grandmother, Queen Eleanor, who had always opposed his interests, was lodged in that place, and was protected by a weak garrison, and ruinous fortifications m. He immediately determined to lay siege to the fortress, and make himself master of her person: But John, rouzed from his indolence by so pressing an occasion, collected an army of English and Brabançons, and advanced from Normandy with hasty marches to the relief of the queen-mother. He fell on Arthur's camp before that prince was aware of the danger; dispersed his army; took him prisoner, together with the count de la Marche, Geosfrey de Lusignan, and the most considerable of the revolted barons; and returned in triumph to Normandy. Philip, who was lying before C H A P. Arques in that dutchy, raifed the fiege and retired, upon his approach. The greater part of the prisoners were fent over to England; but Arthur was shut up in the raftle of Falaise.

¹ Trivet, p. 142. m Ann. Waverl. p. 167. M. West. p. 264.

THE king had here a conference with his nephew; represented to him the folly of his pretensions; and required him to renounce the French alliance, which hid encouraged him to live in a state of enmity with all his family: But the brave, though imprudent, youth, rendered more haughty from misfortunes, maintained the justice of his cause; afferted his claim, not only to the French provinces, but to the crown of England; and in his turn, required the king to restore the son of his elder prother to the possession of his inheritance P. John, sensible, from these symptoms of spirit, that the young prince, though now a prisoner, might hereafter prove a dangerous enemy, determined to prevent all future peril by dispatching Murder of his nephew; and Arthur was never more heard of. circumstances which attended this deed of darkness, were, Britanny no doubt, carefully concealed by the actors, and are variously related by historians: But the most probable account is as follows. The king, it is faid, first proposed to William de la Braye, one of his servants, to dispatch Arthur; but William replied, that he was a gentleman, not a hangman; and he positively refused compliance. Another instrument of murder was found, and was difpatched with proper orders to Falaise; but Hubert de Bourg, chamberlain to the king, and constable of the castle, feigning that he himself would execute the king's mandate, fent back the affaffin, spread the report that the young prince was dead, and publickly performed all the ceremonies of his interment: But finding, that the n Ann. Marg. p. 213. M. West. p. 264. O M. West. p. 264.

C H A P. Bretons vowed revenge for the murder, and that all the revolted barons persevered more obstinately in their rebellion, he thought it prudent to reveal the fecret, and to inform the world that the duke of Britanny was still alive, and in his custody. This discovery proved fatal to the young prince: John first removed him to the castle of Rouen; and coming in a boat, during the night-time, to that place, commanded Arthur to be brought forth to him. The young prince, aware of his danger, and now more fubdued by the continuance of his misfortunes. and by the approach of death, threw himself on his knees before his uncle, and begged for mercy: But the barbarous tyrant, making no reply, stabbed him with his own hands; and fastening a stone to the dead body, threw it into the Seine.

ALL men were struck with horror at this inhuman deed; and from that moment the king, detefted by his fubjects, retained a very precarious authority over both the people and the barons in his dominions. The Bretons, enraged at this disappointment in their fond hopes, waged implacable war against him; and fixing the succession of their government, put themselves in a posture to revenge the murder of their fovereign. John had got into his power his niece, Eleanor, fifter to Arthur, commonly called the damfel of Britanny; and carrying her over to England, detained her ever after in captivity 9: But the Bretons, in despair of recovering this princess, chose Alice for their fovereign; a younger daughter of Constantia, by her second marriage with Gui de Thouars; and they entrusted the government of the dutchy to that nobleman. The states of Britanny meanwhile carried their complaints before Philip as their liege lord, and demanded justice for the violence committed by John on the person of Arthur, so near a relation, C H A P. who, notwithstanding the homage which he did to Normandy, was always regarded as one of the chief vassals of the crown. Philip received their application with pleasure; summoned John to stand a trial before him; and on his non-appearance, passed sentence, with the concurrence of the peers, upon that prince; declared him guilty of selony and parricide; and adjudged him to forseit to his superior lord all his seignories and siefs in France.

⁹ Trivet, p. 145. T. Wykes, p. 36. Ypod. Neuft. p. 459.

THE king of France, whose ambitious and active spirit The king had been hitherto confined, either by the found policy of expelled from the Henry, or the martial genius of Richard, feeing now the French proopportunity favourable against this base and odious prince, vinces. embraced the project of expelling the English, or rather the English king, from France, and of annexing to the crown fo many confiderable fiefs, which, during feveral ages, had been dismembered from it. Many of the other great vaffals, whose jealousy might have interposed, and have obstructed the execution of this project, were not at present in a situation to oppose it; and the rest either looked on with indifference, or gave their affiftance to this dangerous aggrandizement of their fuperior lord. The earls of Flanders and Blois were engaged in the holy war: The count of Champagne was an infant, and under the guardianship of Philip: The dutchy of Britanny, enraged at the murder of their prince, vigorously promoted all his measures: And the general defection of John's vaffals made every enterprize easy and successful against him. Philip, after taking several castles and fortreffes beyond the Loire, which he either garrisoned or dismantled, received the submissions of the count of Alencon, who deferted John, and delivered up all the places under his command to the French: Upon which, Philip r W. Heming. p. 455. M. West. p. 264. Knyghton, p. 2420.

C H A P. broke up his camp, in order to give the troops some repose after the fatigues of the campaign. John, suddenly collecting fome forces, laid fiege to Alençon; and Philip, whose dispersed army could not be brought together in time to fuccour it, faw himself exposed to the disgrace of fuffering the oppression of his friend and confederate. But his active and fertile genius found an expedient against this evil. There was held at that very time a tournament at Moret in the Gatinois; whither all the chief nobility of France and the neighbouring countries had reforted, in order to fignalize their prowess and address. Philip presented himself before them; craved their affistance in his diffress; and pointed out the plains of Alençon as the most honourable field, in which they could display their generosity and martial spirit. Those valorous knights vowed, that they would take vengeance on the base parricide, the stain of arms and of chivalry; and putting themselves, with all their retinue, under the command of Philip, instantly marched to raise the siege of Alençon. John, hearing of their approach, fled from before the place; and in the hurry abandoned all his tents, machines, and baggage, to the enemy.

THIS feeble effort was the last exploit of that slothful and cowardly prince for the defence of his dominions. He thenceforth remained in total inactivity at Rouen; paffing all his time, with his young wife, in paffimes and amusements, as if his state had been in the most profound tranquillity, or his affairs in the most prosperous condition. If he ever mentioned war, it was only to give himself vaunting airs, which, in the eyes of all men, rendered him still more despicable and ridiculous. Let the French go on, faid he, I will retake in a day what it has cost them years to acquire's. His stupidity and indolence appeared fo extraordinary, that the people endeavoured to account for the infatuation by forcery, and believed, that CHAP. he was thrown into this lethargy by some magic or witchcraft. The English barons, finding that their time was wasted to no purpose, and that they must suffer the difgrace of feeing, without refistance; the progress of the French arms, withdrew from their colours, and fecretly returned to their own country t. No one thought of defending a man, who seemed to have deserted himself; and his fubjects regarded his fate with the same indifference, to which, in this preffing exigency, they faw him totally abandoned.

s M. Paris, p. 146. M. West. p. 266.

12036

JOHN, while he neglected all domestic resources, had the meanness to betake himself to a foreign power, whose protection he claimed: He applied to the pope, Innocent III. and entreated him to interpose his authority between him and the French monarch. Innocent, pleased with any occasion of exerting his superiority, fent Philip orders to stop the progress of his arms, and to make peace with the king of England. But the French barons received the message with indignation; disclaimed the temporal authority assumed by the pontiff; and vowed, that they would, to the uttermost, assist their prince against all his enemies; Philip, feconding their ardour, proceeded, instead of obeying the pope's envoys, to lay siege to Chateau Gaillard, the most considerable fortress which remained to guard the frontiers of Normandy.

CHATEAU GAILLARD was situated partly on an island in the river Seine, partly on a rock opposite to it; and was fecured by every advantage, which either art or nature could bestow upon it. The late king, having cast his eye on this favourable fituation, had spared no labour or expence in fortifying it; and it was defended by Roger de Laci, constable of Chester, a determined officer,

1204

CHAP at the head of a numerous garrifon, Philip, who de-_fpaired of taking the place by force, purposed to reduce it by famine; and that he might cut off its communication with the neighbouring country, he threw a bridge across the Seine, while he himself with his army blockaded it by land. The earl of Pembroke, the man of greatest vigour and capacity in the English court, formed a plan for breaking through the French entrenchments, and throwing relief into the place. He carried with him an army of 4000 infantry and 3000 cavalry, and fuddenly attacked, with great fuccess, Philip's camp in the night-time; having left orders, that a fleet of feventy flatbottomed veffels should fail up the Seine, and fall at the fame instant on the bridge. But the wind and the current of the river, by retarding the vessels, disconcerted this plan of operations; and it was morning before the fleet appeared; when Pembroke, though fuccessful in the beginning of the action, was already repulsed with confiderable loss, and the king of France had leifure to defend himself against these new assailants, who also met with a repulse. After this misfortune, John made no farther efforts for the relief of Chateau Gaillard; and Philip had all the leifure requifite for conducting and finishing the fiege. Roger de Laci defended himfelf for a twelvemonth with great obstinacy; and having bravely repelled every attack, and patiently born all the hardfhips of famine, he was at last overpowered by a sudden assault in the night-time, and made prisoner of war, with his garrison ". Philip, who knew how to respect valour even in an enemy, treated him with civility, and gave him the whole city of Paris for the place of his confinement.

WHEN this bulwark of Normandy was once fubdued, all the province lay open to the inroads of Philip; and the king of England despaired of being any longer able to defend it. He fecretly prepared vessels for a scandalous C H A P. flight; and that the Normans might no longer doubt of his resolution to abandon them, he ordered the fortifications of Pont de l'Arche, Moulineaux, and Monfort l'Amauri to be demolished. Not daring to repose confidence in any of his barons, whom he believed to be univerfally engaged in a conspiracy against him, he entrusted the government of the province to Archas Martin and Lupicaire, two mercenary Brabançons, whom he had retained in his fervice. Philip, now fecure of his prey, pushed his conquests with vigour and success against the dismayed Normans. Falaise was first besieged; and Lupicaire, who commanded in this impregnable fortrefs, after furrendering the place, inlifted himself with his troops in the fervice of Philip, and carried on hostilities against his ancient master. Caen, Coutance, Seez, Evreux, Baïeux foon fell into the hands of the French monarch, and all the lower Normandy was reduced under his dominion. To forward his enterprizes on the other division of the province, Gui de Thouars, at the head of the Bretons, broke into the territory, and took Mount St. Michael, Avranches, and all the other fortresses in that neighbourhood. The Normans, who abhorred the French yoke, and who would have defended themselves to the last extremity, if their prince had appeared to conduct them, found no refource but in fubmiffion; and every city opened its gates, as foon as Philip appeared before it. Rouen alone, Arques, and Verneuil determined to maintain their liberties; and formed a confederacy for mutual defence. Philip began with the fiege of Rouen: The inhabitants were fo inflamed with hatred to France, that, on the appearance of his army, they fell on all the natives of that country, whom they found within their walls, and put them to death. But after the French king had begun his operations with fuccefs, and had taken fome of E 3 their

[&]quot; Trivet, p. 144. Gul, Britto, lib. 7. Ann. Waverl. p. 168.

C H A P their outworks, the citizens, feeing no refource, offered to capitulate; and demanded only thirty days to advertise their prince of their danger, and to require fuccours 1205. against the enemy. Upon the expiration of the term, as aft June. no fupply had arrived, they opened their gates to Philip "; and the whole province foon after imitated the example, and submitted to the victor. Thus was this important territory re-united to the crown of France, about three centuries after the cession of it by Charles the Simple to Rollo, the first duke: And the Normans, sensible that this conquest was probably final, demanded the privilege of being governed by French laws; which Philip, making a few alterations on the ancient Norman customs, readily granted them. But the French monarch had too much ambition and genius to stop in his present career of fuccess. He carried his victorious army into the western provinces; foon reduced Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and part of Poictou *; and in this manner, the French crown, during the reign of one able and active prince, received fuch an accession of power and grandeur, as, in

John, on his arrival in England, that he might cover the difgrace of his own conduct, exclaimed loudly against his barons, who, he pretended, had deserted his standard in Normandy; and he arbitrarily extorted from them a seventh of all their moveables, as a punishment for the offence. Soon after he forced them to grant him a scutage of two marks and a half on each knight's see for an expedition into Normandy; but he did not attempt to execute the service, for which he pretended to exact it. Next year, he summoned all the barons of his realm to attend him on this foreign expedition, and collected ships

the ordinary course of things, it would have required

W Trivet, p. 147. Ypod. Neuft. p. 459. y M. Paris, p. 146. M. West. p. 265.

feveral ages to attain.

x Trivet, p. 149.

1206.

from all the fea-ports; but meeting with opposition from C H A P. fome of his ministers, and abandoning his design, he dismissed both sleet and army, and then renewed his exclamations against the barons for deserting him. He next put to fea with a small army, and his subjects believed, that he was refolved to expose himself to the utmost hazard for the defence and recovery of his dominions: But they were furprized, after a few days, to fee him return again into harbour, without attempting any thing. In the fubsequent season, he had the courage to carry his hostile measures a step farther. Gui de Thouars, who governed Britanny, jealous of the rapid progress made by his ally, the French king, promifed to join the king of England with all his forces; and John ventured abroad with a confiderable army, and landed at Rochelle. He marched to Angers; which he took and reduced to ashes. But the approach of Philip with an army threw him into a panic; and he immediately made propofals for peace, and fixed a place of interview with his enemy: But instead of keeping this engagement, he stole off with his army, embarked at Rochelle, and returned, loaded with new shame and difgrace, into England. The mediation of the pope procured him at last a truce for two years with the French monarch 2; almost all the transmarine provinces were ravished from him; and his English barons, though haraffed with arbitrary taxes and fruitless expeditions, saw themselves and their country baffled and affronted in every enterprize.

In an age, when perfonal valour was regarded as the chief accomplishment, such conduct as that of John, always difgraceful, must be exposed to peculiar contempt; and he must thenceforth have expected to rule his turbulent vasfals with a very doubtful authority. But the government, exercised by the Norman princes, had wound

z Rymer, vol. i. p. 141.

yond the usual tenor of the feudal constitutions, that it still behoved him to be debased by new affronts and disgraces, ere his barons could entertain the view of conspiring against him, in order to retrench his prerogatives. The church, which, at that time, declined not a contest with the most powerful and most vigorous monarchs, took first advantage of John's imbecillity; and with the most aggravating circumstances of insolence and scorn, fixed her yoke upon him.

The king's years, and being endowed with a lofty and enterprizing quarrel with the court of genius, gave full fcope to his ambition, and attempted, France.

Perhaps more openly than any of his predeceffors, to convert that fuperiority, which was yielded him by all the vert that fuperiority, which was yielded him by all the European princes, into a real dominion over them. The hierarchy, protected by the Roman pontiff, had already carried to an enormous height its usurpations upon the civil power; but in order to extend them farther, and render them useful to the court of Rome, it was necessary to reduce the ecclesiastics themselves under an absolute monarchy, and to make them entirely dependant on their spiritual leader. For this purpose, Innocent first attempted to impose taxes at pleasure upon the clergy; and in the first year of this century, taking advantage of the popular frenzy for crusades, he sent collectors over all Europe, who levied by his authority the fortieth of all ecclefiaftical revenues, for the relief of the Holy Land, and received the voluntary contributions of the laity to a like amount^a. The fame year Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, attempted another innovation, favourable to ecclefiaftical and papal power: In the king's abfence, he fummoned, by his legantine authority, a fynod of all the C H A P. English clergy, contrary to the inhibition of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the chief jufficiary; and no proper censure was ever passed on this encroachment, the first of the kind, upon the royal power. But a favourable incident foon after happened, which enabled fo aspiring a pontiff as Innocent, to extend still farther his usurpations on fo contemptible a prince as John.

² Rymer, vol. i. p. 119.

HUBERT, the primate, died in 1205; and as the monks or canons of Christ-church, Canterbury, possessed a right of voting in the election of their archbishop, fome of the juniors of the order, who lay in wait for that event, met clandestinely the very night of Hubert's death; and without any congé d'elire from the king, chose Reginald, their fub-prior, for the fuccessor; installed him in the archi-epifcopal throne before midnight; and having enjoined him the firictest secrecy, fent him immediately to Rome, in order to folicit the confirmation of his election b. The vanity of Reginald prevailed over his prudence; and he no fooner arrived in Flanders, than he revealed to every one the purpose of his journey, which was immediately known in England c. The king was enraged at the novelty and temerity of the attempt, in filling fo important an office without his knowledge or confent: The fuffragan bishops of Canterbury, who were accustomed to concur in the choice of their primate, were no less displeased at the exclusion given them in this election: The senior monks of Christ-Church were injured by the irregular proceedings of their juniors: The juniors themselves, ashamed of their conduct, and disgusted with the levity of Reginald, who had broken his engagements with them, were willing to fet aside his election d: And all men concurred in the defign of remedying the false

b M. Paris, p. 148. M. West. p. 266.

d M. West. p. 266.

CHAP. measures, which had been taken. But as John knew, that this affair would be canvassed before a superior tribunal, where the interpolition of royal authority, in beflowing ecclefiaftical benefices, was very invidious; where even the cause of suffragan bishops was not so favourable as that of monks; he determined to make the new election entirely unexceptionable: He submitted the affair wholly to the canons of Christ-church; and departing from the right, claimed by his predecessors, ventured no farther than to inform them privately, that they would do him an acceptable fervice, if they chose John de Gray, bishop of Norwich, for their primate . The election of that prelate was accordingly made without a contradictory vote; and the king, to obviate all contests, endeavoured to persuade the suffragan bishops not to infift on their claim of concurring in the election: But those prelates, persevering in their pretensions, sent an agent to maintain their cause before Innocent; while the king, and the convent of Christ-church, dispatched twelve monks of that order to support, before the same tribunal, the election of the bishop of Norwich.

> THUS there lay three different claims before the pope, whom all parties allowed to be the supreme arbiter in the contest. The claim of the suffragans, being so opposite to the usual maxims of the papal court, was foon set aside: The election of Reginald was fo obvioufly fraudulent and irregular, that there was no possibility of defending it: But Innocent maintained, that, though this election was null and invalid, it ought previously to have been declared fuch by the fovereign pontiff, before the monks could proceed to a new election; and that the choice of the bishop of Norwich was of course as uncanonical as that of his competitor f. Advantage was, therefore, taken of this subtlety for introducing a precedent, by which the C H A P. fee of Canterbury, the most important dignity in the church after the papal throne, should ever after be at the disposal of the court of Rome.

e M. Paris, p. 149. M. West. p. 266. Chron. de Mailr. p. 182.

WHILE the pope maintained fo many fierce contests. in order to wrest from princes the right of granting inveftitures, and to exclude laymen from all authority in conferring ecclefiaftical benefices, he was supported by the united influence of the clergy, who, afpiring to indedependance, fought, with all the ardour of ambition, and all the zeal of superstition, under his facred banners. But no fooner was this point, after a great effusion of blood, and the convulsions of many states, established in fome tolerable degree, than the victorious leader, as is ufual, turned his arms against his own community, and aspired to centre all power in his person. By the invention of referves, provisions, commendams, and other devices, the pope gradually assumed the right of filling vacant benefices; and the plenitude of his apostolic power, which was not subject to any limitations, supplied all defects of title in the person on whom he bestowed preferment. The canons which regulated elections were purposely rendered intricate and involved: Frequent disputes arose among candidates: Appeals were every day carried to Rome: The apostolic see, besides reaping pecuniary advantages from these contests, often exercised the power of fetting afide both the litigants, and on pretence of appeafing faction, nominated a third person, who might be more acceptable to the contending parties.

THE present controversy about the election to the see of Canterbury afforded Innocent an opportunity of claiming this right; and he failed not to perceive and avail himself of the advantage. He sent for the twelve monks deputed by the convent to maintain the cause of the bishop of Norwich; and commanded them, under the penalty 1207. Cardinal Langton appointed archbishop of Canterbury.

CHAP. of excommunication, to chuse for their primate, cardinal Langton, an Englishman by birth, but educated in France, and connected, by his interests and attachments, with the fee of Rome g. In vain did the monks reprefent, that they had received from their convent no authority for this purpose; that an election, without a previous writ from the king, would be deemed highly irregular; and that they were merely agents for another person, whose right they had no power or pretence to abandon. None of them had the courage to persevere in this oppofition, except one; Elias de Brantefield: All the rest. overcome by the menaces and authority of the pope, complied with his orders, and made the election required of them.

INNOCENT, fensible that this flagrant usurpation would be highly refented by the court of England, wrote John a mollifying letter; fent him four golden rings fet with precious stones; and endeavoured to enhance the value of the present, by informing him of the many mysteries implied in it. He begged him to confider feriously the form of the rings, their number, their matter, and their colour. Their form, he faid, being round, shadowed out Eternity, which had neither beginning nor end; and he ought thence to learn his duty of aspiring from earthly objects to heavenly, from things temporal to things eternal. The number four, being a square, denoted steadiness of mind, not to be subverted either by adversity or prosperity, fixed for ever on the firm basis of the four cardinal virtues. Gold, which is the matter, being the most precious of metals, fignified Wisdom, which is the most valuable of all accomplishments, and justly preferred by Solomon to riches, power, and all exterior attainments. The blue colour of the faphire represented Faith; the

g M. Paris, p. 155. Ann. Waverl. p. 169. W. Heming. p. 553. Knyghton, p. 2415.

verdure of the emerald, Hope; the redness of the ruby, C H A P. Charity; and the splendor of the topaz, Good Works h. XI.

By these conceits, Innocent endeavoured to repay John for one of the most important prerogatives of his crown, which he had ravished from him; conceits probably admired by Innocent himself. For it is easily possible for a man, especially in a barbarous age, to unite strong talents for business with an absurd taste for literature and in the arts.

JOHN was inflamed with the utmost rage, when he heard of this attempt of the court of Rome i; and he immediately vented his passion on the monks of Christchurch, whom he found inclined to support the election made by their fellows at Rome. He fent Fulk de Cantelupe, and Henry de Cornhulle, two knights of his retinue, men of violent tempers and rude manners, to expel them the convent, and take possession of their revenues. These knights entered the monastery with drawn swords, commanded the prior and the monks to depart the kingdom, and menaced them, that, in case of disobedience, they would inftantly burn them with the convent k. Innocent, prognosticating, from the violence and imprudence of these measures, that John would finally fink in the contest, persevered the more vigorously in his pretenfions, and exhorted the king not to oppose God and the church any longer, nor to perfecute that cause, for which the holy martyr, St. Thomas, had facrificed his life, and which had exalted him equal to the highest faints in heaven 1: A clear hint to John to profit by the example of his father, and to remember the prejudices and established principles of his subjects, who bore a profound veneration to that martyr, and regarded his merits as the subject of their chief glory and exultation.

h Rymer, vol. i. p. 139. M. Paris, p. 155. i Rymer, vol. i. p. 143. k M. Paris, p. 156. Trivet, p. 151. Ann. Waverl. p. 169. l M. Paris, p. 157.

XI. 1207.

CHAP. INNOCENT, finding that John was not sufficiently tamed to submission, sent three prelates, the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester, to intimate, that, if he persevered in his disobedience, the sovereign pontiff would be obliged to lay the kingdom under an interdict m. All the other prelates threw themselves on their knees before him, and entreated him, with tears in their eyes, to prevent the scandal of this sentence, by making a speedy fubmission to his spiritual Father, by receiving from his hands the new elected primate, and by restoring the monks of Christ-church to all their rights and possessions. He burst out into the most indecent invectives against the prelates; fwore by God's teeth, his usual oath, that, if the pope prefumed to lay his kingdom under an interdict, he would fend to him all the bishops and clergy of England, and would confiscate all their estates; and threatened, that, if thenceforth he caught any Romans in his dominions, he would put out their eyes, and cut off their noses, in order to set a mark upon them, which might distinguish them from all other nations ". Amidst all this idle violence, John stood on such bad terms with his nobility, that he never dared to affemble the states of the kingdom, who, in so just a cause, would probably have adhered to any other monarch, and have defended with vigour the liberties of the nation against these palpable Interdict of usurpations of the court of Rome. Innocent, therefore, perceiving the king's weakness, fulminated at last the fentence of interdict, which he had for some time held fuspended over him °.

the kingdom.

> THE sentence of interdict was at that time the great instrument of vengeance and policy employed by the court of Rome; was denounced against sovereigns for the lights est offences; and made the guilt of one person involve the m M. Paris, p. 157. Ann. Waverl. p. 170. M. West. p. 268.

e Ibid. Trivet, p. 1526

ruin

ruin of millions, even in their spiritual and eternal wel- C H A P. fare. The execution of it was calculated to strike the fenses in the highest degree, and to operate with irrefiftible force on the fuperstitious minds of the people. The nation was of a fudden deprived of all exterior exercife of its religion: The altars were despoiled of their ornaments: The crosses, the reliques, the images, the statues of the faints were laid on the ground; and as if the air itself were profaned, and might pollute them by its contact, the priefts carefully covered them up, even from their own approach and veneration. The use of bells entirely ceased in all the churches: The bells themfelves were removed from the fleeples, and laid on the ground with the other facred utenfils. Mass was celebrated with shut doors; and none but the priests were admitted to that holy institution. The laity partook of no religious rite, except baptism to new-born infants, and the communion to the dying: The dead were not interred in confecrated ground: They were thrown into ditches, or buried in common fields; and their obsequies were not attended with prayers or any hallowed ceremony. Marriage was celebrated in the church-yards P: and that every action in life might bear the marks of this dreadful fituation, the people were prohibited the use of meat, as in Lent, or times of the highest pennance; were debarred from all pleasures and entertainments; and were forbidden even to falute each other, or so much as to shave their beards, and give any decent attention to their person and apparel. Every circumstance carried symptoms of the deepest distress, and of the most immediate apprehenfion of divine vengeance and indignation.

THE king, that he might oppose his temporal to their spiritual terrors, immediately, from his own authority, confiscated the estates of all the clergy who obeyed the their convent, and gave them only fuch a small allowance from their own estates, as would suffice to provide them with food and rayment. He treated with the utmost rigour all Langton's adherents, and every one that showed any disposition to obey the commands of Rome: And in order to distress the clergy in the tenderest point, and at the same time expose them to reproach and ridicule, he threw into prison all their concubines, and required high fines as the price of their liberty.

AFTER the canons, which established the celibacy of the clergy, were, by the zealous endeavours of archbishop Anselm, more rigorously executed in England, the ecclefiaftics gave, almost univerfally and avowedly, into the use of concubinage; and the court of Rome, which had no interest in prohibiting this practice, made very flight opposition to it. The custom was become so prevalent, that, in fome cantons of Swifferland, before the reformation, the laws not only permitted, but, to avoid fcandal, enjoined the use of concubines to the younger clergy s; and it was usual every where for priests to apply to the ordinary, and obtain from him a formal liberty for this indulgence. The bishop commonly took care to prevent the practice from degenerating into licentiousness: He confined the priest to the use of one woman, required him to be conftant to her bed, obliged him to provide for her subsistance and that of her children; and, though the offspring was, in the eye of the law, deemed illegitimate, this commerce was really a kind of inferior marriage, fuch as is still practifed in Germany among the nobles; and may be regarded by the candid, as an appeal from the tyranny of civil and ecclefiastical institutions, to the more virtuous and more unerring laws of nature.

9 Ann. Waverl. p. 170. r M. Paris, p. 158. Ann. Waverl. p. 170. s Padre Paole, Hift. Conc. Trid. lib. 1.

THE

1207

THE quarrel between the king and the fee of Rome C HAP. continued for fome years; and though many of the clergy, from the fear of punishment, obeyed the orders of John, and celebrated divine fervice, they complied with the utmost reluctance, and were regarded, both by themselves and the people, as men who betrayed their principles. and facrificed their conscience to temporal regards and interests. During this violent situation, the king, in order to give a lustre to his government, attempted military expeditions, against Scotland, against Ireland, against the Welsh t; and he commonly prevailed, more from the weakness of his enemies than from his own vigour or abilities. Meanwhile, the danger, to which his government flood continually exposed from the discontents of the ecclefiaftics, encreased his natural propension to tyranny; and he feems to have even wantonly difgusted all orders of men, especially his nobles, from whom alone he could reasonably expect support and affistance. He dishonoured their families by his licentious amours; he published edicts, prohibited them from hunting feathered game, and thereby restrained them from their favourite occupation and amusement "; he ordered all the hedges and fences near his forests to be levelled, that his deer might have more ready access into the fields for pafture; and he continually loaded the nation with arbitrary impositions. Conscious of the general hatred which he had incurred, he required his nobility to give him hostages for security of their allegiance; and they were obliged to put into his hands their fons, nephews, or near relations. When his messengers came with like orders to the castle of William de Braouse, a baron of great note, the lady of that nobleman replied, that the would never entrust her fon into the hands of one 1208.

t W. Heming. p. 556. Ypod. Neuft. p. 460. Knyghton, p. 2420. u M. West. p. 268.

CHAP. who had murdered his own nephew, while in his caffody.

XI. Her husband reproved her for the severity of this speech; but, sensible of his danger, he immediately fled with his wife and son into Ireland, where he endeavoured to conceal himself. The king discovered the unhappy family in their retreat; seized the wife and son, whom he starved to death in prison; and the baron himself narrowly escaped, by slying into France.

1209.

THE court of Rome had artfully contrived a gradation of fentences; by which he kept offenders in awe; still afforded them an opportunity of preventing the next anathema by fubmission; and in case of their obstinacy. was able to refresh the horror of the people against them, by new denunciations of the wrath and vengeance of heaven. As the fentence of interdict had not produced the defired effect on John, and as his people, though extremely discontented, had hitherto been restrained from rifing in open rebellion against him, he was foon to look for the fentence of excommunication: And he had reason to apprehend, that, notwithstanding all his precautions, the most dangerous consequences might ensue from it. He was witness of the other scenes, which, at that very time, were acting in Europe, and which difplayed the unbounded and uncontrouled power of the papacy. Innocent, far from being difmayed at his contests with the king of England, had excommunicated the emperor Otho, John's nephew w; and foon brought that powerful and haughty prince to submit to his authority. He published a crusade against the Albigenses, a species of enthulialts in the fouth of France, whom he denominated heretics; because, like other enthusiasts, they neglected the rites of the church, and opposed the power and influence of the clergy: The people from all parts of C H A P. Europe, moved by their superstition and their passion for wars and adventures, flocked to his flandard: Simon de 1200. Montfort, the general of the crusade, acquired to himfelf a fovereignty in these provinces: The count of Toulouse, who protected, or perhaps only tolerated the Albigenses, was stripped of his dominions: And these sectaries themselves, though the most innocent and inoffenfive of mankind, were exterminated with all the circumstances of extreme violence and barbarity. Here were therefore both an army and a general, dangerous from their zeal and valour, who might be directed to act against John; and Innocent, after keeping the thunder long suspended, gave at last authority to the bishops of Excommu-London, Ely, and Worcester, to fulminate the sentence the king. of excommunication against him *. These prelates obeyed; though their brethren were deterred from publishing. as the pope required of them, the fentence in the feveral churches of their dioceses.

w M. Paris, p. 160. Trivet, 154. M. Weft. p. 269.

No fooner was the excommunication known, than the effects of it appeared. Geoffrey, archdeacon of Norwich, who was entrusted with a considerable office in the court of exchequer, being informed of it while sitting on the bench, observed to his colleagues the danger of serving under an excommunicated king; and he immediately left his chair, and departed the court. John gave orders to seize him, to throw him into prison, to cover his head with a great leaden cope; and by this and other severe usage, he soon put an end to his life; Nor was there any thing wanting to Geoffrey, except the dignity and rank of Becket, to exalt him to an equal station in heaven with that great and celebrated martyr. Hugh de Wells, the chancellor, being elected by the king's appointment, bishop of Lincoln, upon a vacancy in that

^{*} M. Paris, p. 159. M. West. p. 270.

Y M. Paris, p. 159.

C H A P. fee, defired leave to go abroad, in order to receive confecration from the archbishop of Rouen; but he no sooner reached France, than he hastened to Pontigny, where Langton then refided, and paid fubmiffions to him as his primate. The bishops, finding themselves exposed either to the jealousy of the king or hatred of the people, gradually stole out of the kingdom; and at last there remained only three prelates to perform the functions of the episcopal office 2. Many of the nobility, terrified by John's tyranny, and obnoxious to him on different accounts, imitated the example of the bishops; and most of the others, who remained, were with reason suspected of having fecretly entered into a confederacy against him a. John was alarmed at his dangerous fituation; a fituation, which prudence, vigour, and popularity, might formerly have prevented, but which no virtues or abilities were now fufficient to retrieve. He defired a conference with Langton at Dover; offered to acknowledge him as primate, to submit to the pope, to restore the exiled clergy, even to pay them a limited fum as a compensation for the rents of their confiscated estates. But Langton, perceiving his advantage, was not fatisfied with these concesfions: He demanded, that full restitution and reparation should be made to all the clergy; a condition so exorbitant, that the king, who probably had not the power of fulfilling it, and who forefaw that this estimation of damages might amount to an immense sum, finally broke off the conference b.

John's subjects from their oaths of fidelity and allegiance, and to declare every one excommunicated who had any commerce with him, in public or in private; at his z Ann. Waverl. p. 170. Ann. Marg. p. 14. a M. Parisa p. 162. M. West. p. 270, 271. b Ann. Waverl. p. 171.

table,

table, in his council, or even in private conversation : C H A P. And this fentence was accordingly, with all imaginable folemnity, pronounced against him. But as John still persevered in his contumacy, there remained nothing but the fentence of deposition; which, though intimately connected with the former, had been diffinguished from it by the artifice of the court of Rome; and Innocent determined to dart this last thunder-bolt against the refractory monarch. But as a sentence of this kind required an armed force to execute it, the pontiff, casting his eyes around, fixed at last on Philip, king of France, as the person, into whose powerful hand he could most properly entrust that weapon, the ultimate resource of his ghoffly authority. And he offered the monarch, befides the remission of all his fins and endless spiritual benefits, the property and possession of the kingdom of England, as the reward of his labour d.

IT was the common concern of all princes to oppose these exorbitant pretensions of the Roman pontiff, by which they themselves were rendered vassals, and vassals totally dependant, of the papal crown: Yet even Philip. the most able monarch of the age, was seduced, by present interest, and by the prospect of so tempting a prize, to accept this liberal offer of the pontiff, and thereby to ratify that authority, which, if he ever opposed its boundless usurpations, might, next day, tumble him from the throne. He levied a great army; fummoned all the vaffals of the crown to attend him at Rouen; collected a fleet of 1700 veffels, great and small, in the sea-ports of Normandy and Picardy; and partly from the zealous spirit of the age, partly from the perfonal regard univerfally paid him, prepared a force, which seemed equal to the greatness of his enterprize. The king, on the other 1213.

c M. Paris, p. 161. M. West. p. 270. 4 M. Paris, p. 162. M. West. p. 271.

CHAP. hand, iffued out writs, requiring the attendance of all his military tenants at Dover, and even of all able-bodied men, to defend the kingdom in this dangerous extremity. A great number appeared; and he felected an army of 60,000 men; a power invincible, had they been united in affection to their prince, and animated with a becoming zeal for the defence of their native country . But the people were fwayed by fuperstition, and regarded their king with horror, as anathematized by papal cenfures: The barons, besides lying under the same prejudices, were all disgusted by his tyranny, and were, many of them, suspected of holding a secret correspondence with the enemy: And the incapacity and cowardice of the

from the French invasion.

PANDOLF, whom the pope had chosen for his legate, and appointed to head this important expedition, had, before he left Rome, applied for a fecret conference with his mafter, and had asked him, whether, if the king of England, in this desperate situation, were willing to submit to the apostolic see, the church should, without the confent of Philip, grant him any terms of accommodation !? Innocent, expecting from his agreement with a prince so abject both in character and fortune, more advantages than from his alliance with a great and victorious monarch, who, after fuch mighty acquisitions, might become too haughty to be bound by spiritual chains, explained to Pandolf the conditions on which he was willing to be reconciled to the king of England. The legate, therefore, as foon as he arrived in the north of France, fent over two knights templars to defire an interview with John at Dover, which was readily granted: He there represented to him, in such strong, and probably king himfelf, ill-fitted to contend with those mighty difficulties, made men prognofficate the most fatal effects in fuch true colours, his lost condition, the disaffection C H A P. of his subjects, the secret combination of his vasfals against him, the mighty armament of France, that John, 1213. yielded at discretion s, and subscribed to all the conditions The king's which Pandolf was pleased to impose upon him. He submission to the pope. promifed, among other articles, that he would submit himfelf entirely to the judgment of the pope; that he would acknowledge Langton for primate; that he would restore all the exiled clergy and laity, who had been banished on account of the contest; that he would make them full restitution of their goods, and compensation for all damages, and inftantly confign eight thousand pounds, in part of payment; and that every one outlawed or imprisoned for his adherence to the pope, should immediately be received into grace and favour h. Four barons fwore, along with the king, to the observance of this ignominious treaty 1.

⁸ M. Paris, p. 163. M. West. p. 271. S M. Paris. p. 162.

But the ignominy of the king was not vet carried to its full height. Pandolf required him, as the first trial of obedience, to refign his kingdom to the church; and he perfuaded him, that he could no wife fo effectually disappoint the French invasion, as by thus putting himself under the immediate protection of the apostolic fee. John, lying under the agonies of present terror, made no scruple of submitting to this condition. He passed a charter, in which he said, that, not constrained by fear, but of his own free-will, and by the common advice and confent of his barons, he had, for remission of his own fins and those of his family, refigned England and Ireland to God, to St. Peter and St. Paul, and to pope Innocent and his fuccessors in the apostolic chair; He agreed to hold these dominions as feudatory of the church of Rome, by the annual payment of a thousand

g M. West. p. 271. Annal. Burt. p. 268.

h Rymer, vol. i. p. 166. M. Paris, p. 163.
i Rymer, vol. i. p. 170. M. Paris, p. 163.
F 4. marks;

CHAP marks; feven hundred for England, three hundred for Ireland: And he stipulated, that, if he or his successors should ever presume to revoke or infringe this charter, they should instantly, except upon admonition they repented of their offence, forfeit all right to their dominions k.

15th May. In consequence of this agreement, John did homage to Pandolf as the pope's legate, with all the submiffive rites which the feudal law required of vaffals before their liegelord and superior. He came disarmed into the legate's presence, who was seated on a throne; he flung himself on his knees before him; he lifted up his joined hands, and put them within those of Pandolf; he swore fealty to the pope; and he paid part of the tribute, which he owed for his kingdom as the patrimony of St. Peter. The legate, elated by this fupreme triumph of facerdotal power. could not forbear discovering extravagant symptoms of joy and exultation: He trampled on the money, which was laid at his feet, as an earnest of the subjection of the kingdom: An insolence, of which, however offensive to all the English, no one present, except the archbishop of Dublin, dared to take any notice. But though Pandolf had brought the king to fubmit to these base conditions, he still refused to free him from the excommunication and interdict, till an estimation should be taken of the losses of the ecclefiaftics, and full compensation and restitution should be made them.

TOHN, reduced to this abject fituation under a foreign power, still showed the same disposition to tyrannize over his subjects, which had been the chief cause of all his misfortunes. One Peter of Pomfret, a hermit, had foretold, that the king, this very year, should lose his crown; and for that rash prophecy, he had been thrown into prison in Corfe-castle. John now determined to bring him to punishment as an impostor; and though C H A P. the man pleaded, that his prophecy was fulfilled, and that the king had lost the royal and independent crown which he formerly wore, the defence was supposed to appravate his guilt: He was dragged at horses tails, to the town of Warham, and there hanged on a gibbet with his fon 1.

2 92538103

k Rymer, vol. i. p. 176. M. Paris, p. 165.

WHEN Pandolf, after receiving the homage of John, returned to France, he congratulated Philip on the fuccefs of his pious enterprize; and informed him, that John, moved by the terror of the French arms, had now come to a just sense of his guilt; had returned to obedience under the apostolic see; had even consented to do homage to the pope for his dominions; and having thus made his kingdom a part of St. Peter's patrimony, had rendered it impossible for any Christian prince, without the most manifest and most flagrant impiety, to attack him m. Philip was enraged on receiving this intelligence: He exclaimed, that having, at the pope's infligation, undertaken an expedition, which had cost him above 60,000 pounds fterling, he was frustrated of his purpose, at the time when its fuccess was become infallible: He complained, that all the expence had fallen upon him; all the advantages had accrued to Innocent: He threatened to be no longer the dupe of these hypocritical pretences: And affembling his vaffals, he laid before them the illtreatment which he had received, exposed the interested and fraudulent conduct of the pope, and required their affiftance to execute his enterprize against England, in which, he told them, that, notwithstanding the inhibitions and menaces of the legate, he was determined to persevere. The French barons were in that age little less ignorant and superstitious than the English: Yet, so

¹ M. Paris, p. 165. Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 56.

m Trivet, p. 160.

C H A P. much does the influence of those religious principles depend on the present dispositions of men! they all vowed 1213. to follow their prince on his intended expedition, and were resolute not to be disappointed of that glory and those riches, which they had long expected from this enterprize. The earl of Flanders alone, who had previously formed a fecret treaty with John, declaring against the injustice and impiety of the undertaking, retired with his forces ": and Philip, that he might not leave fo dangerous an enemy behind him, first turned his arms against the dominions of that prince. Meanwhile, the English fleet was affembled under the earl of Salisbury, the king's natural brother: and though inferior in number, received orders to attack the French in their harbours. Salisbury performed this fervice with fo much fuccefs, that he took three hundred ships; destroyed a hundred more o: And Philip, finding it impossible to prevent the rest from falling into the hands of the enemy, fet fire to them himself, and thereby rendered it impossible for him to proceed any

> JOHN, exulting in his present security, insensible to his past difgrace, was so elated with this success, that he thought of no less than invading France in his turn, and recovering all those provinces which the prosperous arms of Philip had formerly ravished from him. He proposed this expedition to the barons, who were already affembled for the defence of the kingdom. But the English nobles both hated and despised their prince: They prognosticated no fuccess to any enterprize conducted by such a leader: And pretending, that their time of fervice was elapfed, and all their provisions exhausted, they refused to second his undertaking . The king, however, resolute in his purpose, embarked with a few followers, and failed to farther in his enterprize.

p. 59. Trivet, p. 157.

n M. Paris, p. 166. OM. Paris, p. 166. Chron. Dunft. vol. i.

p M. Paris, p. 166.

Jersey, in the foolish expectation, that the barons would C H A P. at last be ashamed to stay behind q. But finding himself disappointed, he returned to England; and raising some troops, threatened to take vengeance on all his nobles for their defertion and disobedience. The archbishop of Canterbury, who was in a confederacy with the barons, here interposed; strictly inhibited the king from thinking of fuch an attempt; and threatened him with a renewal of the fentence of excommunication, if he pretended to levy war upon any of his fubjects, before the kingdom were freed from the fentence of interdict .

THE church had recalled the feveral anathemas pronounced against John, by the same gradual progress with which she had at first issued them. By receiving his homage, and admitting him to the rank of a vaffal, his deposition had been virtually annulled, and his subjects were again bound by their oaths of allegiance. The exiled prelates had then returned in great triumph, with Langton at their head; and the king hearing of their approach, went forth to meet them, and throwing himself on the ground before them, he entreated them with tears to have compaffion on him and the kingdom of England . The primate, feeing these marks of fincere penitence, led him to the chapter-house of Winchester, and there administered 20th Julya an oath to him, by which he again swore fealty and obedience to pope Innocent and his fuccessors; promised to love, maintain, and defend holy church and the clergy; engaged that he would re-establish the good laws of his predeceffors, particularly those of St. Edward, and would abolish the wicked ones; and expressed his resolution of maintaining justice and right in all his dominions t. The primate next gave him absolution in the requisite forms, and admitted him to dine with him, to the great joy of 9 M. Paris, p. 166. r M. Paris, p. 167. s M. Paris, p. 166. Ann. Waverl. p. 178. M. Paris, p. 166.

CHAP, all the people. The sentence of interdict, however, was _ still upheld against the kingdom. A new legate, Nicholas, bishop of Frescati, came into England, in the room of 1213. Pandolf; and he declared it to be the pope's intentions never to loosen that sentence till full restitution were made to the clergy of every thing taken from them, and ample reparation for all damages which they had fuftained. He only permitted mass to be said with a low voice in the churches, till those losses and damages could be estimated to the satisfaction of the parties. Certain barons were appointed to take an account of the claims; and John was aftonished at the greatness of the sums, to which the clergy made their loffes to amount. No less than twenty thousand marks were demanded by the monks of Canterbury alone; twenty-three thousand for the see of Lincoln; and the king, finding these pretentions to be exorbitant and endless, offered the clergy the sum of a hundred thousand marks for a final acquittal. The clergy rejected the offer with difdain; but the pope, willing to favour his new vaffal, whom he found zealous in his declarations of fealty, and regular in paying the stipulated tribute to Rome, directed his legate to accept of forty thoufand. The issue of the whole was, that the bishops and confiderable abbots got reparation beyond what they had any title to demand: The inferior clergy were obliged to fit down contented with their loffes: And the king, after the interdict was taken off, renewed, in the most folemn manner, and by a new charter, fealed with gold, his professions of homage and obedience to the fee of Rome.

WHEN this vexatious affair was at last brought to a conclusion, the king, as if he had nothing farther to attend to but triumphs and victories, went over to Poictou, which still acknowledged his authority "; and he carried

u Queen Eleanor died in 1203 or 1204.

war into Philip's dominions. He befieged a castle near C H A P. Angiers; but the approach of prince Lewis, Philip's fon, obliged him to raise the siege with such precipitation, that he left his tents, machines, and baggage behind him: and he returned to England with difgrace. About the same time, he heard of the great and decifive victory gained by the king of France at Bovines over the emperor Otho, who had entered France at the head of 150,000 Germans; a victory which established for ever the glory of Philip, and gave full fecurity to all his dominions. John could, therefore, think henceforth of nothing farther, than of ruling peaceably his own kingdom; and his close connexions with the pope, which he was determined at any price to maintain, enfured him, as he imagined, the certain attainment of that object. But the last and most grievous scene of this prince's misfortunes still awaited him; and he was destined to pass through a series of more humiliating circumstances than had ever yet fallen to the lot of any other monarch.

THE introduction of the feudal law into England by William the Conqueror had much infringed the liberties, Discontents however imperfect, enjoyed by the Anglo-Saxons in their barons. ancient government, and had reduced the whole people to a state of vassalage under the king or barons, and even the greater part of them to a state of real slavery. The necessity also of entrusting great power in the hands of a prince, who was to maintain military dominion over a vanquished nation, had engaged the Norman barons to fubmit to a more severe and absolute prerogative than that to which men of their rank, in other feudal governments, were commonly subjected. The power of the crown, once raifed to a high pitch, was not eafily reduced; and the nation, during the course of a hundred and fifty years, was governed by an authority, unknown, in the same degree, to all the kingdoms founded by the northern conquerors.

C H A P. querors. Henry I. that he might allure the people to give an exclusion to his elder brother Robert, had granted them a charter, favourable in many particulars to their liberties; Stephen had renewed the grant; Henry II. had confirmed it: But the concessions of all these princes had still remained without effect; and the same unlimited, at least irregular authority, continued to be exercised both by them and their fucceffors. The only happiness was, that arms were never yet ravished from the hands of the barons and people: The nation, by a great confederacy, might still vindicate its liberties: And nothing was more likely, than the character, conduct, and fortunes of the reigning prince, to produce fuch a general combination against him. Equally odious and contemptible, both in public and private life, he affronted the barons by his infolence, dishonoured their families by his gallantries, enraged them by his tyranny, and gave difcontent to all ranks of men by his endless exactions and impositions w. The effect of these lawless practices had already appeared in the general demand made by the barons of a restoration of their privileges; and after he had reconciled himself to the pope, by abandoning the independance of the kingdom, he appeared to all his subjects in fo mean a light, that they univerfally thought they might with fafety and honour infift upon their pretenfions.

Bur nothing forwarded this confederacy fo much as the concurrence of Langton, archbishop of Canterbury; a man, whose memory, though he was obtruded on the nation by a palpable incroachment of the see of Rome, ought always to be respected by the English. This prelate, whether he was moved by the generosity of his nature and his affection to public good; or had entertained

w Chron. Mailr. p. 188. T. Wykes, p. 36. Ann. Waverl. p. 181. W. Heming. p. 557.

an animolity against John, on account of the long oppo- C HAP. fition made by that prince to his election; or thought that an acquisition of liberty to the people would serve to encrease and secure the privileges of the church; had formed the plan of reforming the government, and had prepared the way for that great innovation, by inferting those fingular clauses above-mentioned in the oath, which he administered to the king, before he would absolve him from the fentence of excommunication. Soon after, in a private meeting of some principal barons at London, he showed them a copy of Henry I.'s charter, which, he faid, he had happily found in a monastery; and he exhorted them to infift on the renewal and observance of it: The barons fwore, that they would sooner lose their lives than depart from fo reasonable a demand w. The confederacy began now to spread wider, and to comprehend almost all the barons in England; and a new and more numerous meeting was fummoned by Langton at St. Edmondfbury, November. under colour of devotion. He again produced to the affembly the old charter of Henry; renewed his exhortations of unanimity and vigour in the profecution of their purpose; and represented in the strongest colours the tyranny to which they had so long been subjected, and from which it now behoved them to free themselves and their posterity x. The barons, inflamed by his eloquence, incited by the fense of their own wrongs, and encouraged by the appearance of their power and numbers, folemnly took an oath before the high altar, to adhere to each other, to infift on their demands, and to make endless war on the king, till he should submit to grant them r. They agreed, that, after the festival of Christmas, they would prefer in a body their common petition; and in the mean time, they separated, after mutually engaging, that they would put themselves in a posture of defence, would inlist

C H A P. men and purchase arms, and would supply their castles izis. Eth Jane THE barons appeared in London on the day appointed; and demanded of the king, that, in confequence of his own oath before the primate, as well as in deference to their just rights, he should grant them a renewal of Henry's charter, and a confirmation of the laws of St. Edward. The king, alarmed with their zeal and unanimity, as well as with their power, required a delay; promised, that, at the sestion of Easter, he would give them a positive answer to their petition; and offered them the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of Ely, and the earl of Pembroke, the Mareschal, as sureties for his sulfilling this engagement z. The barons accepted of the terms, and peaceably returned to their castles.

15th Jan.

During this interval, John, in order to break or fubdue the league of his barons, endeavoured to avail himself of the ecclesiastical power, of whose influence he had, from his own recent misfortunes, had fuch fatal experience. He granted to the clergy a charter, relinquishing for ever that important prerogative, for which his father and all his ancestors had zealously contended; yielding to them the free election on all vacancies; referving only the power to issue a congé d'elire, and to subjoin a confirmation of the election; and declaring, that, if either of these were with-held, the choice should nevertheless be deemed just and valid 2. He made a vow to lead an army into Palestine against the infidels, and he took on him the cross; in hopes, that he should receive from the church that protection, which she tendered to every one that had entered into this facred and meritorious engagement b.

² M. Paris, p. 176. W. West. p. 273.

^a Rymer, vol. i. p. 197.

^b Rymer, vol. i. p. 200. Trivet, p. 162. T. Wykes, p. 37. M. West.

p. 273.

And

And he fent to Rome his agent, William de Mauclerc, C H A P. in order to appeal to the pope against the violence of his barons, and procure him a favourable fentence from that powerful tribunal c. The barons also were not negligent on their part in endeavouring to engage the pope in their interests: They dispatched Eustace de Vescie to Rome: laid their case before Innocent as their seudal lord; and petitioned him to interpose his authority with the king. and oblige him to reftore and confirm all their just and undoubted privileges d.

INNOCENT beheld with regret the disturbances which had arisen in England, and was much inclined to favour John in his pretenfions. He had no hopes of retaining and extending his newly acquired superiority over that kingdom, but by supporting so base and degenerate a prince, who was willing to facrifice every confideration to his present safety: And he foresaw, that, if the administration should fall into the hands of those gallant and high-spirited barons, they would vindicate the honour. liberty, and independance of the nation, with the fame ardour which they now exerted in defence of their own. He wrote letters therefore to the prelates, to the nobility, and to the king himself. He exhorted the first to employ their good offices in conciliating peace between the contending parties, and putting an end to civil difcord: To the fecond, he expressed his disapprobation of their conduct in employing force to extort concessions from their reluctant fovereign: The last, he advised to treat his nobles with grace and indulgence, and to grant them fuch of their demands as should appear just and reasonable .

THE barons eafily faw, from the tenor of these letters, that they must reckon on having the pope, as well as the king, for their adverfary; but they had already advanced

c Rymer, vol. i. p. 184. VOL. II.

d Ibid,

e Ibid. p. 196, 197.

C H A P too far to recede from their pretentions, and their passions were fo deeply engaged, that it exceeded even the power of superstition itself any longer to controul them. They also forefaw, that the thunders of Rome, when not seconded by the efforts of the English ecclesiastics, would be of small avail against them; and they perceived, that the most considerable of the prelates, as well as all the inferior clergy, professed the highest approbation of their cause. Besides, that these men were seized with the national passion for laws and liberty; blessings, of which they themselves expected to partake; there concurred very powerful causes to loosen their devoted attachment to the apostolic see. It appeared, from the late usurpations of the Roman pontiff, that he pretended to reap alone all the advantages accruing from that victory, which, under his banners, though at their own peril, they had every where obtained over the civil magistrate. The pope assumed a despotic power over all the churches: Their particular customs, privileges, and immunities, were treated with disdain: Even the canons of general councils were fet afide by his difpenfing power: The whole administration of the church was centered in the court of Rome: All preferments ran of course in the same channel: And the provincial clergy faw, at least felt, that there was a necessity for limiting these pretensions. The legate, Nicholas, in filling those numerous vacancies which had fallen in England during an interdict of fix years, had proceeded in the most arbitrary manner; and had paid no regard, in conferring dignities, to perfonal merit, to rank, to the inclination of the electors, or to the customs of the country. The English church was univerfally difgusted; and Langton himself, though he owed his elevation to an incroachment of the Romish fee, was no fooner established in his high office, than he became jealous of the privileges annexed to it, and formed ed attachments with the country subjected to his juris- C H A P. diction. These causes, though they opened slowly the eyes of men, failed not to produce their effect: They set bounds to the usurpations of the papacy: The tide first slopped, and then turned against the sovereign pontist: And it is otherwise inconceivable, how that age, so prone to superstition, and so sunk in ignorance, or rather so devoted to a spurious erudition, could have escaped falling into an absolute and total slavery under the court of Rome.

ABOUT the time that the pope's letters arrived in Eng-Insurrection land, the malcontent barons, on the approach of the of the bafestival of Easter, when they were to expect the king's answer to their petition, met by agreement at Stamford; and they affembled a force, confifting of above 2000 knights, befides their retainers and inferior perfons without number. Elated with their power, they advanced in 27th April, a body to Brackley, within fifteen miles of Oxford, the place where the court then refided; and they there received a message from the king, by the archbishop of Canterbury and the earl of Pembroke, defiring to know what those liberties were which they so zealously challenged from their fovereign. They delivered to these messengers a schedule, containing the chief articles of their demands; which was no fooner shown to the king, than he burst into a furious passion, and asked, why the barons did not also demand of him his kingdom? swearing, that he would never grant them fuch liberties as must reduce himself to slavery f.

No fooner were the confederated nobles informed of John's reply, than they chose Robert Fitz-Walter their general, whom they called the mareschal of the army of God and of holy church; and they proceeded without farther ceremony to levy war upon the king. They be-

f M. Paris, p. 176.

C H A P. fieged the castle of Northampton during fifteen days, though without success f: The gates of Bedford castle were willingly opened to them by William Beauchamp, 1215. 24th May, its owner: They advanced to Ware in their way to London, where they held a correspondence with the principal citizens: They were received without opposition into that capital: And finding now the great superiority of their force, they iffued proclamations, requiring the other barons to join them, and menacing them, in case of refusal or delay, with committing devastation on their houses and estates s. In order to show what might be expected from their prosperous arms, they made incurfions from London, and laid waste the king's parks and palaces; and all the barons, who had hitherto carried the femblance of supporting the royal party, were glad of this pretence for openly joining a cause, which they always had fecretly favoured. The king was left at Odiham in Surrey with a poor retinue of only feven knights; and after trying feveral expedients to elude the blow, after offering to refer all differences to the pope alone, or to eight barons, four to be chosen by himself, and four by the confederates b, he found himself at last obliged to submit at discretion.

Magna Charta. 15th June. A CONFERENCE between the king and the barons was appointed at Runnemede, between Windfor and Staines; a place which has ever fince been extremely celebrated, on account of this great event. The two parties encamped a-part, like open enemies; and after a debate of a few days, the king, with a facility fomewhat suspicious, signed and sealed the charter which was required of him. This famous deed, commonly called the GREAT CHARTER, either granted or secured very important liberties

19th June.

f M. Paris, p. 177. Chron. Dunst. vol. i. p. 73. 5 M. Paris, p. 177. 200.

and

and privileges to every order of men in the kingdom; to C H A P. the clergy, to the barons, and to the people.

The freedom of elections was fecured to the clergy: 1215.

The freedom of elections was fecured to the clergy: The former charter of the king was confirmed, by which the necessity of a royal congé d'elire and confirmation was superseded: All check upon appeals to Rome was removed, by the allowance granted every man to depart the kingdom at pleasure: And the fines to be imposed on the clergy, for any offence, were ordained to be proportional to their lay estates, not to their ecclesiastical benefices.

THE privileges granted to the barons were either abatements in the rigour of the feudal law, or determinations in points which had been left by that law, or had become by practice, arbitrary and ambiguous. The reliefs of heirs fucceeding to a military fee were afcertained; an earl's and baron's at a hundred marks, a knight's at a hundred shillings. It was ordained by the charter, that, if the heir be a minor, he shall, immediately upon his majority, enter upon his estate, without paying any relief: The king shall not fell his wardship: He shall levy only reasonable profits upon the estate, without committing waste or hurting the property: He shall uphold the caftles, houses, mills, parks, and ponds: And if he commit the guardianship of the estate to the sheriff or any other, he shall previously oblige them to find surety to the fame purpose. During the minority of a baron, while his lands are in wardship, and are not in his own possesfion, no debt which he owes to the Jews shall bear any interest. Heirs shall be married without disparagement; and before the marriage be contracted, the nearest relations of the person shall be informed of it. A widow, without paying any relief, shall enter upon her dower, the third part of her hufband's rents: She shall not be compelled to marry, fo long as fhe chuses to continue fingle; she shall only give security never to marry without her lord's G 3 confent.

C H A P. consent. The king shall not claim the wardship of any minor, who holds lands by military tenure of a baron, on pretence that he also holds lands of the crown, by soccage or any other tenure. Scutages shall be estimated at the fame rate as in the time of Henry I.; and no scutage or aid, except in the three general feudal cases, the king's captivity, the knighting of his eldeft fon, and the marrying of his eldest daughter, shall be imposed but by the great council of the kingdom; the prelates, earls, and great barons, shall be called to this great council, each by a particular writ; the leffer barons by a general fummons of The king shall not seize any baron's land for the sheriff. a debt to the crown, if the baron possesses as many goods and chattels as are sufficient to discharge the debt. No man shall be obliged to perform more service for his see than he is bound to by his tenure. No governor or constable of a castle shall oblige any knight to give money for castle-guard, if the knight be willing to perform the service in person, or by another able-bodied man; and if the knight be in the field himself, by the king's command, he shall be exempted from all other service of this nature. No vaffal shall be allowed to fell so much of his land as to incapacitate himself from performing his service to his lord.

These were the principal articles, calculated for the interest of the barons; and had the charter contained nothing farther, national happiness and liberty had been very little promoted by it, as it would only have tended to encrease the power and independence of an order of men, who were already too powerful, and whose yoke might have become more heavy on the people than even that of an absolute monarch. But the barons, who alone drew and imposed on the prince this memorable charter, were necessitated to insert in it other clauses of a more extensive and more beneficent nature: They could not expect the concurrence of the people, without comprehending, together with their own, the interests of inferior ranks of men; C H A P. and all provisions, which the barons, for their own fake, were obliged to make, in order to ensure the free and equitable administration of justice, tended directly to the benefit of the whole community. The following were the principal clauses of this nature.

ther

IT was ordained, that all the privileges and immunities above-mentioned, granted to the barons against the king, should be extended by the barons to their inferior vasfals. The king bound himfelf not to grant any writ, empowering a baron to levy aids from his vasfals, except in the three feudal cases. One weight and one measure shall be established throughout the kingdom. Merchants shall be allowed to transact all business, without being exposed to any arbitrary tolls and impositions: They and all free men shall be allowed to go out of the kingdom and return to it at pleasure: London, and all cities and burghs, thall preserve their ancient liberties, immunities, and free customs: Aids shall not be required of them but by the confent of the great council: No towns or individuals shall be obliged to make or support bridges but by ancient custom: The goods of every freeman shall be disposed of according to his will: If he die intestate, his heirs shall fucceed to them. No officer of the crown shall take any horses, carts, or wood, without the consent of the owner. The king's courts of justice shall be stationary, and shall no longer follow his person: They shall be open to every one; and justice shall no longer be fold, refused, or delayed by them. Circuits shall be regularly held every year: The inferior tribunals of justice, the county court, sheriff's turn, and court-leet shall meet at their appointed time and place: The sheriffs shall be incapacitated to hold pleas of the crown; and shall not put any person upon his trial, from rumour or fuspicion alone, but upon the evidence of lawful witnesses. No freeman shall be taken CHAP-or imprisoned, or dispossessed of his free tenement and liberties, or outlawed, or banished, or any wise hurt or injured, unless by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land; and all who suffered otherwise in this or the two former reigns, shall be restored to their rights and possessions. Every freeman shall be fined in proportion to his fault; and no fine shall be levied on him to his utter ruin: Even a villain or rustic shall not by any sine be bereaved of his carts, ploughs, and implements of husbandry. This was the only article calculated for the interests of this body of men, probably at that time the most numerous in the kingdom.

IT must be confessed, that the former articles of the Great Charter contain fuch mitigations and explanations of the feudal law as are reasonable and equitable; and that the latter involve all the chief outlines of a legal government, and provide for the equal distribution of justice, and free enjoyment of property; the great objects for which political fociety was at first founded by men, which the people have a perpetual and unalienable right to recal, and which no time, nor precedent, nor flatute, nor positive institution, ought to deter them from keeping ever uppermost in their thoughts and attention. Though the provisions made by this charter might, conformably to the genius of the age, be esteemed too concise, and too bare of circumstances, to maintain the execution of its articles, in opposition to the chicanery of lawyers, fupported by the violence of power; time gradually afcertained the fense of all the ambiguous expressions; and those generous barons, who first extorted this concession, still held their fwords in their hands, and could turn them against those who dared, on any pretence, to depart from the original spirit and meaning of the grant. We may, now, from the tenor of this charter, conjecture what those laws were of king Edward, which the English nation, during fo many generations, still defired, with such C H A P. an obstinate perseverance, to have recalled and established. They were chiefly these latter articles of Magna Charta: and the barons, who, at the beginning of these commotions, demanded the revival of the Saxon laws, undoubtedly thought, that they had fufficiently fatisfied the people. by procuring them this concession, which comprehended the principal objects, to which they had fo long aspired. But what we are most to admire, is the prudence and moderation of those haughty nobles themselves, who were enraged by injuries, inflamed by opposition, and elated by a total victory over their fovereign. They were content, even in this plenitude of power, to depart from some articles of Henry I.'s charter, which they made the foundation of their demands, particularly from the abolition of wardships, a matter of the greatest importance; and they feem to have been sufficiently careful not to diminish too far the power and revenue of the crown. If they appear, therefore, to have carried other demands to too great a height, it can be ascribed only to the faithless and tyrannical character of the king himfelf, of which they had long had experience, and which, they forefaw, would, if they provided no farther fecurity, lead him foon to infringe their new liberties, and revoke his own concessions. This alone gave birth to those other articles, seemingly exorbitant, which were added as a rampart for the fafeguard of the Great Charter.

THE barons obliged the king to agree, that London should remain in their hands, and the Tower be configned to the custody of the primate, till the 15th of August ensuing, or till the execution of the several articles of the Great Charter k. The better to ensure the fame end, he allowed them to chuse five and twenty k Rymer, vol. i. p. 201. Chron, Dunft. vol. i. p. 73.

CHAP, members from their own body, as conservators of the 1215.

public liberties; and no bounds were fet to the authority of these men either in extent or duration. If any complaint were made of a violation of the charter, whether attempted by the king, justiciaries, sheriffs, or foresters, any four of these barons might admonish the king to redrefs the grievance: If fatisfaction were not obtained, they could affemble the whole council of twenty-five; who, in conjunction with the great council, were empowered to compel him to observe the charter, and, in case of resistance, might levy war against him, attack his castles, and employ every kind of violence, except against his royal person, and that of his queen and children. All men, throughout the kingdom, were bound, under the penalty of confiscation, to swear obedience to the twenty-five barons; and the freeholders of each county were to chuse twelve knights, who were to make report of fuch evil customs as required redress, conformably to the tenor of the Great Charter !. The names of those conservators were the earls of Clare, Albemarle, Glocester, Winchester, Hereford, Roger Bigod, earl of Norfolk, Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, William Mareschal the younger, Robert Fitz-Walter, Gilbert de Clare, Eustace de Vescev, Gilbert Delaval, William de Moubray, Geoffrey de Say, Roger de Mombezon, William de Huntingfield, Robert de Ros, the constable of Chester, William de Aubenie, Richard de Perci, William Malet, John Fitz-Robert, William de Lanvalay, Hugh de Bigod, and Roger de Montfichet m. These men were, by this convention, really invested with the fovereignty of the kingdom: They were rendered co-ordinate with the king, or rather funerior to him.

I This feems a very firong proof that the house of commons was not then in being; otherwise the knights and burgesses from the several counties could have given into the lords a lift of grievances, without so unusual an election. m M. Paris, p. 181.

him, in the exercise of the executive power: And as C H A P. there was no circumstance of government, which, either directly or indirectly, might not bear a relation to the security or observance of the Great Charter; there could securely occur any incident, in which they might not lawfully interpose their authority.

TOHN feemed to fubmit passively to all these regulations, however injurious to majesty: He fent writs to all the sheriffs, ordering them to constrain every one to fwear obedience to the twenty-five barons n: He dismissed all his foreign forces: He pretended, that his government was thenceforth to run in a new tenor, and be more indulgent to the liberty and independance of his people. But he only diffembled, till he should find a favourable opportunity for annulling all his concessions. The injuries and indignities, which he had formerly fuffered from the pope and the king of France, as they came from equals or fuperiors, feemed to make but fmall impression on him: But the sense of this perpetual and total subjection under his own rebellious vassals, sunk deep in his mind, and he was determined, at all hazards, to throw off fo ignominious a flavery o. He grew fullen. filent, and referved: He shunned the society of his courtiers and nobles: He retired into the Isle of Wight. as if defirous of hiding his shame and confusion; but in this retreat he meditated the most fatal vengeance against all his enemies P. He fecretly fent abroad his emissaries to inlift foreign foldiers, and to invite the rapacious Brabancons into his fervice, by the prospect of sharing the spoils of England, and reaping the forfeitures of so many opulent barons, who had incurred the guilt of rebellion, by rifing in arms against him q. And he dispatched a messenger to Rome, in order to lay before the pope the Great Charter, which he had been compelled to fign, and n M. Paris, p. 182. O Ibid. p. 183. P Ibid. 9 M. Paris, p. 183. Chron. Dunft. vol. i, p. 72. Chron. Mailr. p. 188.

C H A P. to complain, before that tribunal, of the violence, which had been imposed upon him r.

INNOCENT, confidering himself as feudal lord of the kingdom, was incensed at the temerity of the barons, who, though they pretended to appeal to his authority, had dared, without waiting for his confent, to impose fuch terms on a prince, who, by refigning to the Roman pontiff his crown and independance, had placed himfelf immediately under the papal protection. He issued, therefore, a bull, in which, from the plenitude of his apostolic power, and from the authority, which God had committed to him, to build and deftroy kingdoms, to plant and overthrow, he annulled and abrogated the whole charter, as unjust in itself, as obtained by compulsion, and as derogatory to the dignity of the apostolic fee. He prohibited the barons from exacting the observance of it: He even prohibited the king himself from paying any regard to it: He absolved him and his subjects from all oaths, which they had been constrained to take to that purpose: And he pronounced a general sentence of excommunication against every one, who should perfevere in maintaining fuch treasonable and iniquitous pretensions s.

Renewal of the civil wars.

THE king, as his foreign forces arrived along with this bull, now ventured to take off the mask; and, under sanction of the pope's decree, recalled all the liberties which he had granted to his subjects, and which he had solumnly sworn to observe. But the spiritual weapon was found upon trial to carry less force with it, than he had reason from his own experience to apprehend. The primate resused to obey the pope in publishing the sentence of excommunication against the barons; and though he was cited to Rome, that he might attend a general council, there assembled, and was suspended, on account

r M. Paris, p. 183. Chron. Dunst. vol. i. p. 73. vol. i. p. 203, 204, 205. 208. M. Paris, p. 184, 185. 187.

$215.

of his disobedience to the pope, and his secret correspond - C H A P. ence with the king's enemies t: Though a new and particular fentence of excommunication was pronounced by name against the principal barons "; John still found, that his nobility and people, and even his clergy, adhered to the defence of their liberties, and to their combination against him: The sword of his foreign mercenaries was all he had to trust to for restoring his authority.

THE barons, after obtaining the Great Charter, feem to have been lulled into a fatal fecurity, and to have taken no rational measures, in case of the introduction of a foreign force, for re-affembling their armies. The king was from the first master of the field; and immediately laid fiege to the castle of Rochester, which was obstinately defended by William de Albiney, at the head of a hundred and forty knights with their retainers, but was at last reduced by famine. John, irritated with the relistance, 30th Nov. intended to have hanged the governor and all the garrison; but on the representation of William de Mauleon, who fuggested to him the danger of reprizals, he was content to facrifice, in this barbarous manner, the inferior prifoners only w. The captivity of William de Albiney, the best officer among the confederated barons, was an irreparable loss to their cause; and no regular opposition was thenceforth made to the progress of the royal arms. The ravenous and barbarous mercenaries, incited by a cruel and enraged prince, were let loofe against the estates, tenants, manors, houses, parks of the barons, and spread devastation over the face of the kingdom. Nothing was to be feen but the flames of villages and caftles reduced to ashes, the consternation and misery of the inhabitants, tortures exercifed by the foldiery to make them reveal their concealed treasures, and reprizals no less barbarous, committed by the barons and their partizans on the t M. Paris, p. 189.

u Rymer, vol. i. p. 211. M. Paris, p. 192.

W M. Paris, p. 187,

C H A P. royal demesnes, and on the estates of such as still adhered to the crown. The king, marching through the whole extent of England, from Dover to Berwic, laid the provinces waste on each side of him; and considered every flate, which was not his immediate property, as entirely hostile and the object of military execution. The nobility of the north in particular, who had shewn greatest violence in the recovery of their liberties, and who, acting in a feparate body, had expressed their discontent even at the concessions made by the Great Charter; as they could expect no mercy, fled before him with their wives and families, and purchased the friendship of Alexander, the young king of Scots, by doing homage to him.

PrinceLewis.

THE barons, reduced to this desperate extremity, and called over. menaced with the total loss of their liberties, their properties, and their lives, employed a remedy no less desperate; and making applications to the court of France, they offered to acknowledge Lewis, the eldest son of Philip, for their fovereign; on condition, that he would afford them protection from the violence of their enraged prince. Though the fense of the common rights of mankind, the only rights that are entirely indefeafible, might have justified them in the deposition of their king; they declined infifting before Philip, on a pretention, which is commonly fo difagreeable to fovereigns, and which founds harshly in their royal ears. They affirmed, that John was incapable of fucceeding to the crown, by reafon of the attainder, passed upon him during his brother's reign; though that attainder had been reverfed, and Richard had even, by his last will, declared him his fuc-They pretended, that he was already legally deposed by sentence of the peers of France, on account of the murder of his nephew; though that fentence could not possibly regard any thing but his transmarine dominions.

1216.

dominions, which alone he held in vaffalage to that C H A P. crown. On more plaufible grounds, they affirmed, that he had already deposed himself by doing homage to the pope, changing the nature of his fovereignty, and refigning an independant crown for a fee under a foreign power. And as Blanche of Castile, the wife of Lewis, was descended by her mother from Henry II. they maintained, though many other princes stood before her in the order of succession, that they had not shaken off the royal family, in chusing her husband for their fovereign.

PHILIP was strongly tempted to lay hold on the rich prize which was offered to him. The legate menaced him with interdicts and excommunications, if he invaded the patrimony of St. Peter, or attacked a prince. who was under the immediate protection of the holy fee x: But as Philip was affured of the obedience of his own vaffals, his principles were changed with the times, and he now undervalued as much all papal cenfures, as he formerly pretended to pay respect to them. His chief fcruple was with regard to the fidelity, which he might expect from the English barons in their new engagements, and the danger of entrusting his fon and heir into the hands of men, who might, on any caprice or necesfity, make peace with their native fovereign, by facrificing a pledge of so much value. He therefore exacted from the barons twenty-five hostages of the most noble birth in the kingdom y; and having obtained this fecurity, he fent over first a small army to the relief of the confederates; then more numerous forces, which arrived with Lewis himself at their head.

THE first effect of the young prince's appearance in England was the defertion of John's foreign troops, who, being mostly levied in Flanders, and other provinces of x M. Paris, p. 194. M. West. p. 275. Chron, Dunft, vol. i. p. 74.

⁷ M. Paris, p. 193.

1216.

C H A P. France, refused to serve against the heir of their monarchy. The Gascons and Poictevins alone, who were still John's fubiects, adhered to his cause; but they were too weak to maintain that fuperiority in the field, which they had hitherto supported against the confederated barons. Many confiderable noblemen deferted John's party, the earls of Salisbury, Arundel, Warrene, Oxford, Albemarle, and William Mareschal the younger: His castles fell daily into the hands of the enemy: Dover was the only place. which, from the valour and fidelity of Hubert de Burgh, the governor, made refistance to the progress of Lewis *: And the barons had the melancholy prospect of finally fucceeding in their purpose, and of escaping the tyranny of their own king, by imposing on themselves and the nation a foreign yoke. But this union was of short duration between the French and English nobles; and the imprudence of Lewis, who, on every occasion, showed too visible a preference to the former, encreased that jealoufy, which it was fo natural for the latter to entertain in their present fituation b. The viscount of Melun, too, it is faid, one of his courtiers, fell fick at London, and finding the approaches of death, he fent for fome of his friends among the English barons, and warning them of their danger, revealed Lewis's fecret intentions of exterminating them and their families as traitors to their prince, and of bestowing their estates and dignities on his native subjects, in whose fidelity he could more reasonably place confidence c. This story, whether true or false, was univerfally reported and believed; and concurring with other circumstances, which rendered it credible, didgreat prejudice to the cause of Lewis. The earl of Salisbury and other noblemen deferted again to John's party d ; and as men eafily change fides in a civil war, especially where

² Ibid. p. 198. Chron. Dunft. vol. i z M. Paris, p. 195. p. 75, 76. b W. Heming. p. 559. e M. Paris, p. 199. d Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 78. M. West. p. 277.

where their power is founded on an hereditary and inde-C H A P. pendant authority, and is not derived from the opinion and favour of the people, the French prince had reason to 1216. dread a fudden reverse of fortune. The king was affembling a confiderable army, with a view of fighting one great battle for his crown; but passing from Lynne to Lincolnshire, his road lay along the sea-shore, which was overflowed at high water; and not chufing the proper time for his journey, he lost in the inundation all his carriages, treasure, baggage, and regalia. The affliction for this difaster, and vexation from the distracted state of his affairs, encreased the fickness under which he then laboured; and though he reached the castle of Newark, he was obliged to halt there, and his distemper soon after put an end to his life, in the forty-ninth year of his age, 17th Octob. and eighteenth of his reign; and freed the nation from the dangers, to which it was equally exposed, by his fuccess or by his misfortunes.

ace

181

the

THE character of this prince is nothing but a compli- and characcation of vices, equally mean and odious; ruinous to ter of the himself, and destructive to his people. Cowardice, inactivity, folly, levity, licentiousness, ingratitude, treachery, tyranny, and cruelty; all these qualities appear too evidently in the feveral incidents of his life, to give us room to fuspect that the disagreeable picture has been anywise overcharged, by the prejudices of the ancient historians. It is hard to say, whether his conduct to his father, his brother, his nephew, or his subjects, was most culpable; or whether his crimes in these respects were not even exceeded by the baseness, which appeared in his transactions with the king of France, the pope, and the barons. His European dominions, when they devolved to him by the death of his brother, were more extensive than have ever, fince his time, been ruled by any English monarch: But he first lost by his misconduct the flourishing provinces in France, the ancient patrimony of his family: VOL. II.

the see of Rome: He saw the prerogatives of his crown diminished by law, and still more reduced by saction:

And he died at last, when in danger of being totally expelled by a foreign power, and of either ending his life miserably in prison, or seeking shelter as a sugitive from the pursuit of his enemies.

THE prejudices against this prince were so violent, that he was believed to have sent an embassy to the Miramoulin or emperor of Morocco, and to have offered to change his religion and become Mahometan, in order to purchase the protection of that monarch. But though this story is told us, on plausible authority, by Matthew Paris e, it is in itself utterly improbable; except, that there is nothing so incredible but may be believed to proceed from the folly and wickedness of John.

The monks throw great reproaches on this prince for his impiety and even infidelity; and as an inftance of it, they tell us, that, having one day caught a very fat flag, he exclaimed, How plump and well fed is this animal! and yet I dare fwear, he never heard mass f. This fally of wit, upon the usual corpulency of the priests, more than all his enormous crimes and iniquities, made him pass with them for an atheist.

John left two legitimate fons behind him, Henry, born on the first of October, 1207, and now nine years of age; and Richard, born on the fixth of January, 1209; and three daughters, Jane afterwards married to Alexander king of Scots; Eleanor married first to William Mareschal the younger, earl of Pembroke, and then to Simon Mountfort, earl of Leicester; and Isabella married to the emperor Frederic II. All these children were born to him by Isabella of Angoulesme, his second wife.

e P. 169.

f M. Paris, 170.

His illegitimate children were numerous; but none of C H A P. them were any wife diffinguished.

IT was this king, who in the ninth year of his raise.

It was this king, who, in the ninth year of his reign, first gave by charter to the city of London, the right of electing annually a mayor out of its own body, an office which was till now held for life. He gave the city also power to elect and remove its sheriffs at pleasure, and its common-council-men annually. London bridge was sinished in this reign: The former bridge was of wood. Maud the empress was the first that built a stone bridge in England.

MY HOUSE BLAND

His illegitimate children were munchons; but none or C u a 4, them were any wife cilling allegations.

It was this time, who, in the nime was of his reign, the gave by chartes to the city of hondon, the right of the gave by chartes an out of he own body, an office which was all new held for life. He gave the city also power to slock and receive the florish or pleasings, and the corn on connection a cantally. Loudon bridge was distincted in the reign: The former ineign was of word who did do coppede as a the first that built a floor bridge was bridge.

APPENDIX

APPENDIX II.

The FEUDAL and ANGLO-NORMAN GOVERNMENT and MANNERS.

Origin of the feudal law——Its progress—— Feudal government of England——The feudal parliament
——The commons——Judicial power——Revenue of the crown——Commerce——The church——Civil Laws——Manners.

HE feudal law is the chief foundation, both of Appendix the political government and of the jurisprudence, established by the Normans in England. Our subject therefore requires, that we should form a just idea of this law, in order to explain the state, as well of that kingdom, as of all other kingdoms of Europe, which, during those ages, were governed by fimilar institutions. And though I am sensible, that I must here repeat many observations and reflections, which have been communicated by others &; yet, as every book, agreeably to the observation of a great historian h, should be as complete as possible within itself, and should never refer, for any thing material, to other books, it will be necessary, in this place, to deliver a short plan of that prodigious fabric, which, for feveral centuries, preferved fuch a mixture of liberty and oppression, order and anarchy, stabi-

g L'Esprit de Loix. Dr. Robertson's History of Scotland.

h Padre Paolo Hift, Conc. Trid,

Appendix lity and revolution, as was never experienced in any other II. age or any other part of the world.

Origin of the feudal law.

AFTER the northern nations had subdued the provinces of the Roman empire, they were obliged to establish a system of government, which might secure their conquests, as well against the revolt of their numerous subjects, who remained in the provinces, as from the inroads of other tribes, who might be tempted to ravish from them their new acquisitions. The great change of circumstances made them here depart from those institutions, which prevailed among them, while they remained in the forests of Germany; yet was it still natural for them to retain, in their present settlement, as much of their ancient customs as was compatible with their new situation.

THE German governments, being more a confederacy of independant warriors, than a civil fubjection, derived their principal force from many inferior and voluntary affociations, which individuals formed under a particular head or chieftain, and which it became the highest point of honour to maintain with inviolable fidelity. The glory of the chief confifted in the number, the bravery, and the zealous attachment of his retainers: The duty of the retainers required, that they should accompany their chief in all wars and dangers, that they should fight and perish by his fide, and that they should esteem his renown or his favour a sufficient recompence for all their fervices i. The prince himself was nothing but a great chieftain, who was chosen from among the rest, on account of his superior valour or nobility; and who derived his power from the voluntary affociation or attachment of the other chieftains.

WHEN a tribe governed by these ideas, and actuated by these principles, subdued a large territory, they found, that, though it was necessary to keep themselves in a mi- Appendix litary posture, they could neither remain united in a body, nor take up their quarters in feveral garrifons, and that their manners and institutions debarred them from using these expedients; the obvious ones, which, in a like fituation, would have been employed by a more civilized nation. Their ignorance in the art of finances, and perhaps the devastations inseparable from such violent conquests, rendered it impracticable for them to levy taxes fufficient for the pay of numerous armies; and their repugnance to subordination, with their attachment to rural pleasures, made the life of the camp or garrison, if perpetuated during peaceful times, extremely odious and difguftful to them. They feized, therefore, fuch a portion of the conquered lands as appeared necessary; they affigned a share for supporting the dignity of their prince and government; they distributed other parts, under the title of fiefs, to the chiefs; these made a new partition among their retainers; the express condition of all these grants was, that they might be resumed at pleafure, and that the possessor, so long as he enjoyed them, should still remain in readiness to take the field for the defence of the nation. And though the conquerors immediately separated, in order to enjoy their new acquisitions, their martial disposition made them readily fulfil the terms of their engagement: They affembled on the first alarm; their habitual attachment to the chieftain made them willingly fubmit to his command; and thus a regular military force, though concealed, was always ready, to defend, on any emergence, the interest and honour of the community.

I Tacit, de Mor, Germ,

WE are not to imagine, that all the conquered lands were seized by the northern conquerors; or that the whole of the land thus seized was subjected to those military services. This supposition is consuted by the his-

Appendix tory of all the hations on the continent. Even the idea, given us of the German manners by the Roman historian, may convince us, that that bold people would never have been content with fo precarious a fubfistence, or have fought to procure establishments, which were only to continue during the good pleasure of their fovereign. Though the northern chieftains accepted of lands, which, being confidered as a kind of military pay, might be refumed at the will of the king or general; they also took possession of estates, which, being hereditary and independant, enabled them to maintain their native liberty, and support, without court-favour, the honour of their rank and family.

Progress of the feudal law.

Bur there is a great difference, in the confequences, between the distribution of a pecuniary subsistence, and the affignment of lands burthened with the condition of military service. The delivery of the former, at the weekly, monthly, or annual terms of payment, still recalls the idea of a voluntary gratuity from the prince, and reminds the foldier of the precarious tenure by which he holds his commission. But the attachment, naturally formed with a fixed portion of land, gradually begets the idea of fomething like property, and makes the possessor forget his dependant fituation, and the condition which was at first annexed to the grant. It seemed equitable, that one who had cultivated and fowed a field, should reap the harvest: Hence fiefs, which were at first entirely precarious, were foon made annual. A man, who had employed his money in building, planting, or other improvements, expected to reap the fruits of his labour or expence: Hence they were next granted during a term of years. It would be thought hard to expel a man from his possessions, who had always done his duty, and performed the conditions on which he originally received them: Hence the chieftains, in a subsequent period, thought themselves themselves entitled to demand the enjoyment of their feudal lands during life. It was found, that a man would more willingly expose himself in battle, if assured, that his family should inherit his possessions, and should not be left by his death in want and poverty: Hence siefs were made hereditary in families, and descended, during one age, to the son, then to the grandson, next to the brothers, and afterwards to more distant relations k. The idea of property stole in gradually upon that of military pay; and each century made some sensible addition to the stability of siefs and tenures.

In all these successive acquisitions, the chief was supported by his vaffals; who, having originally a strong connexion with him, augmented by the constant intercourse of good offices, and by the friendship arising from vicinity and dependance, were inclined to follow their leader against all his enemies, and voluntarily, in his private quarrels, paid him the fame obedience, to which by their tenure they were bound in foreign wars. While he daily advanced new pretentions to fecure the possession of his superior fief, they expected to find the same advantage, in acquiring stability to their subordinate ones; and they zealously opposed the intrusion of a new lord, who would be inclined, as he was fully intitled, to bestow the posfession of their lands on his own favourites and retainers. Thus the authority of the fovereign gradually decayed; and each noble, fortified in his own territory by the attachment of his vaffals, became too powerful to be expelled by an order from the throne; and he secured by law what he had at first acquired by usurpation.

During this precarious state of the supreme power, a difference would immediately be experienced between those portions of territory which were subjected to the feudal tenures, and those which were possessed by an allo-

Appendix dial or free title. Though the latter possessions had at first been esteemed much preferable, they were soon found, by the progressive changes introduced into public and private law, to be of an inferior condition to the former. The possessions of a feudal territory, united by a regular subordination under one chief, and by the mutual attachments of the vaffals, had the fame advantages over the proprietors of the other, that a disciplined army enjoys over a difperfed multitude; and were enabled to commit with impunity all injuries on their defenceless neighbours. Every one, therefore, hastened to feek that protection which he found so necessary; and each allodial proprietor, refigning his possessions into the hands of the king, or of some nobleman respected for power or valour, received them back with the condition of feudal fervices!, which, though a burden fomewhat grievous, brought him ample compensation, by connecting him with the neighbouring proprietors, and placing him under the guardian-Thip of a potent chieftain. The decay of the political government thus necessarily occasioned the extension of the feudal: The kingdoms of Europe were univerfally divided into baronies, and these into inferior fiefs: And the attachment of vassals to their chief, which was at first an effential part of the German manners, was still supported by the same causes from which it at first arose; the necessity of mutual protection, and the continued intercourfe, between the head and the members, of benefits and fervices.

> But there was another circumstance, which corroborated these seudal dependancies, and tended to connect the vassals with their superior lord by an indissoluble bond of union. The northern conquerors, as well as the more early Greeks and Romans, embraced a policy, which is unavoidable to all nations that have made slender advances in refinement: They every where united the civil jurif- Appendix diction with the military power. Law, in its commencement, was not an intricate science, and was more governed by maxims of equity, which feem obvious to common fense, than by numerous and subtile principles, applied to a variety of cases by profound reasonings from analogy. An officer, though he had paffed his life in the field, was able to determine all legal controversies which could occur within the diffrict committed to his charge; and his decisions were the most likely to meet with a prompt and ready obedience, from men who respected his person, and were accustomed to act under his command. The profit, arising from punishments, which were then chiefly pecuniary, was another reason for his defiring to retain the judicial power; and when his fief became hereditary, this authority, which was effential to it, was also transmitted to his posterity. The counts and other magistrates, whose power was merely official, were tempted, in imitation of the feudal lords, whom they refembled in fo many particulars, to render their dignity perpetual and hereditary; and in the decline of the regal power, they found no difficulty in making good their pretenfions. After this manner the vaft fabric of feudal fubordination became quite folid and comprehensive: it formed every where an effential part of the political constitution; and the Norman and other barons, who followed the fortunes of William, were fo accustomed to it, that they could fearcely form an idea of any other fpecies of civil government m.

Marculf, Form. 47. apud Lindenbr. p. 1238.

20.

THE Saxons, who conquered England, as they exterminated the ancient inhabitants, and thought themselves secured by the sea against new invaders, found it less re-

m The ideas of the feudal government were so rooted, that even lawyers, in those ages, could not form a notion of any other constitution. Regnum, (says Bracton, lib. 2, cap. 34.) quod en comitatibus & basonibus dicitur effe confitutum.

Appendix quisite to maintain themselves in a military posture: The quantity of land, which they annexed to offices, feems to have been of small value; and for that reason continued the longer in its original fituation, and was always poffessed during pleasure by those who were intrusted with the command. These conditions were too precarious to fatisfy the Norman barons, who enjoyed more independant possessions and jurisdictions in their own country: and William was obliged, in the new diffribution of land; to copy the tenures, which were now become univerfal on the continent. England of a fudden became a feudal kingdom "; and received all the advantages, and was exposed to all the inconveniencies, incident to that species of civil polity; reference way was a soon who it's realt grow

The feudal government

ACCORDING to the principles of the feudal law, the of England. king was the supreme lord of the landed property: All possessions, who enjoyed the fruits or revenue of any part of it, held those privileges, either mediately or immediately, of him; and their property was conceived to be, in fome degree, conditional o. The land was still apprehended to be a species of benefice, which was the original conception of a feudal property; and the vaffal owed, in return for it, stated fervices to his baron, as the baron himself did for his land to the crown. The vasfal was obliged to defend his baron in war; and the baron, at the head of his vassals, was bound to fight in defence of the king and kingdom. But besides these military services, which were cafual, there were others imposed of a civil nature, which were more conftant and durable,

THE northern nations had no idea, that any man, trained up to honour, and enured to arms, was ever to be governed, without his own confent, by the absolute will of another; or that the administration of justice was ever to be exercised by the private opinion of any one magi- Appendix frate, without the concurrence of some other persons, whose interest might induce them to check his arbitrary and iniquitous decifions. The king, therefore, when he found it necessary to demand any service of his barons or chief tenants, beyond what was due by their tenures, was obliged to assemble them, in order to obtain their consent: And when it was necessary to determine any controversy, which might arise among the barons themselves, the question must be discussed in their presence, and be decided according to their opinion or advice. In thefe two circumstances of confent and advice, consisted chiefly the civil fervices of the ancient barons; and these implied all the confiderable incidents of government. In one view, the barons regarded this attendance as their principal privilege; in another, as a grievous burden. That no momentous affairs could be transacted without their confent and advice, was in general esteemed the great security of their possessions and dignities: But as they reaped no immediate profit from their attendance at court, and were exposed to great inconvenience and charge by an abfence from their own estates, every one was glad to exempt himself from each particular exertion of this power; and was pleafed both that the call for that duty should feldom return upon him, and that others should undergo the burden in his flead. The king, on the other hand, was usually anxious, for several reasons, that the asfembly of the barons should be full at every stated or casual meeting: This attendance was the chief badge of their fubordination to his crown, and drew them from that independance which they were apt to affect in their own castles and manors; and where the meeting was thin or ill attended, its determinations had less authority, and commanded not fo ready an obedience from the whole community.

E Coke Comm. on Lit. p. 1, 2. ad fect. 1. p. 109. Smith de Rep. lib. 3. cap. 10.

[·] Somner of Gavelk,

Appendix THE case was the same with the barons in their courts as with the king in the supreme council of the nation. It was requifite to affemble the vaffals, in order to determine by their vote any question which regarded the barony; and they fat along with the chief in all trials, whether civil or criminal, which occurred within the limits of their jurisdiction. They were bound to pay suit and service at the court of their baron; and as their tenure was military, and confequently honourable, they were admitted into his fociety, and partook of his friendship. Thus, a kingdom was confidered only as a great barony, and a barony as a fmall kingdom. The barons were peers to each other in the national council, and, in some degree, companions to the king: The vaffals were peers to each other in the court of barony, and companions to their baron P.

> But though this refemblance fo far took place, the vasfals, by the natural course of things, universally, in the feudal constitutions, fell into a greater subordination under the baron, than the baron himself under his fovereign; and these governments had a necessary and infallible tendency to augment the power of the nobles. The great chief, refiding in his country-feat, which he was commonly allowed to fortify, loft, in a great measure, his connexion or acquaintance with the prince; and added every day new force to his authority over the vallals of the barony. They received from him education in all military exercises: His hospitality invited them to live and enjoy fociety in his hall: Their leifure, which was great, made them perpetual retainers on his person, and partakers of his country sports and amusements: They had no means of gratifying their ambition but by making a figure in his train: His favour and countenance was their greatest honour: His displeasure exposed them to contempt and ignominy: And they felt every moment the necessity of his protection, both in the controversies which occurred with other vassals, and what was more material, in the daily inroads and injuries which were committed by the neighbouring barons. During the time of general war, the sovereign, who marched at the head of his armies, and was the great protector of the state, always acquired some accession to his authority, which he lost during the intervals of peace and tranquillity: But the loose police, incident to the seudal constitutions, maintained a perpetual, though secret hostility, between the several members of the state; and the vassals found no means of securing themselves against the injuries, to which they were continually exposed, but by closely adhering to their chief, and falling into a submissive dependance upon him.

P Du Cange Gloff. in verb. Par. Cujac. Commun. in Lib. Feud. lib. 1. tit. p. 18. Spelm, Gloff, in verb.

IF the feudal government was fo little favourable to the true liberty even of the military vaffal, it was still more destructive of the independance and security of the other members of the flate, or what in a proper fense we call the people. A great part of them were ferfs, and lived in a state of absolute slavery or villainage: The other inhabitants of the country paid their rent in fervices, which were in a great measure arbitrary; and they could expect no redress of injuries, in a court of barony, from men. who thought they had a right to oppress and tyrannize over them: The towns were fituated either within the demesnes of the king, or the lands of the great barons, and were almost entirely subjected to the absolute will of their mafter. The languishing state of commerce kept the inhabitants poor and contemptible; and the political institutions were calculated to render that poverty perpetual. The barons and gentry, living in rustic plenty and hofpitality, gave no encouragement to the arts, and had no demand for any of the more elaborate manufactures: Every profession was held in contempt but that of arms: And if any merchant or manufacturer rose by industry

Appendix and frugality to a degree of opulence, he found himself II. but the more exposed to injuries, from the envy and avidity of the military nobles.

THESE concurring causes gave the feudal governments fo strong a bias towards aristocracy, that the royal authority was extremely eclipfed in all the European states; and, instead of dreading the growth of monarchical power, we might rather expect, that the community would every where crumble into fo many independant baronies, and lose the political union, by which they were cemented. In elective monarchies, the event was commonly answerable to this expectation; and the barons, gaining ground on every vacancy of the throne, raifed themselves almost to a state of sovereignty, and sacrificed to their power both the rights of the crown and the liberties of the people. But hereditary monarchies had a principle of authority, which was not fo eafily subverted; and there were several causes, which still maintained a degree of influence in the hands of the fovereign.

THE greatest baron could never lose view entirely of those principles of the feudal constitution, which bound him, as a vaffal, to fubmission and fealty towards his prince; because he was every moment obliged to have recourse to those principles, in exacting fealty and submission from his own vasfals. The lesser barons, finding that the annihilation of royal authority left them exposed without protection to the infults and injuries of more potent neighbours, naturally adhered to the crown, and promoted the execution of general and equal laws. The people had still a stronger interest to desire the grandeur of the fovereign; and the king, being the legal magistrate, who suffered by every internal convulsion or oppression, and who regarded the great nobles as his immediate rivals, assumed the falutary office of general guardian or protector of the commons. Befides the prerogatives with which the law invested him; his large demesse and numerous retainers rendered him, in one sense, the greatest baron in his kingdom; and where he was possessed of personal vigour and abilities (for his situation required these advantages) he was commonly able to preserve his authority, and maintain his station as head of the community, and the chief sountain of law and justice.

the

THE first kings of the Norman race were favoured by another circumstance, which preserved them from the encroachments of their barons. They were generals of a conquering army, which was obliged to continue in a military posture, and to maintain great subordination under their leader, in order to secure themselves from the revolt of the numerous natives, whom they had bereaved of all their properties and privileges. But though this circumstance supported the authority of William and his immediate fuccessors, and rendered them extremely absolute, it was lost as soon as the Norman barons began to incorporate with the nation, to acquire a fecurity in their possessions, and to fix their influence over their vasfals, tenants, and flaves. And the immense fortunes, which the Conqueror had bestowed on his chief captains, served to support their independance, and make them formidable to the fovereign.

HE gave, for inftance, to Hugh de Abrincis, his sister's fon, the whole county of Chester, which he erected into a palatinate, and rendered by his grant almost independant of the crown 9. Robert, earl of Mortaigne had 973 manors and lordships: Allan, earl of Britanny and Richmond, 442: Odo, bishop of Baieux, 439 : Geosfrey, bishop of Coutance, 280 : Walter Gisfard, earl of Buckingham, 107: William, earl Warrenne, 298, besides 28 towns or hamlets in Yorkshire: Todenei, 81: Roger

⁴ Cambd. in Chesh. Spel. Gloff, in verb. Comes Palatinus.

r Brady's Hift. p. 198. 200. SOrder. Vital.

Appendix Bigod, 123: Robert, earl of Eu, 119: Roger Mortimer, 132, besides several hamlets: Robert de Stafford, 130: Walter de Eurus, earl of Salisbury, 46: Geoffrey de Mandeville, 118: Richard de Clare, 171: Hugh de Beauchamp, 47: Baldwin de Ridvers, 164: Henry de Ferrers, 222: William de Percy, 1191: Norman d'Arcy, 22". Sir Henry Spelman computes, that, in the large county of Norfolk, there were not, in the Conqueror's time, above fixty-fix proprietors of land w. Men. poffessed of such princely revenues and jurisdictions, could not long be retained in the rank of fubjects. The great earl Warrenne, in a subsequent reign, when he was questioned concerning his right to the lands which he possessed, drew his fword, which he produced as his title; adding, that William the Bastard did not conquer the kingdom himself; but that the barons, and his ancestor among the rest, were joint adventurers in the enterprize x.

The feudal parliament.

THE supreme legislative power of England was lodged in the king and great council, or what was afterwards called the parliament. It is not doubted but the archbishops, bishops, and most considerable abbots were constituent members of this council. They sat by a double title: By prescription, as having always possessed that privilege, through the whole Saxon period, from the first establishment of Christianity; and by their right of baronage, as holding of the king in eapite by military service. These two titles of the prelates were never accurately distinguished. When the usurpations of the church had risen to such a height, as to make the bishops affect a separate dominion, and regard their seat in parliament

t Dugdale's Baronage, from Domesday-book, vol. i. p. 60. 74. iii. 112. 132. 136. 138. 156. 174. 200. 207. 223. 254. 257. 269.

I Ibid. p. 369. It is remarkable that this family of d'Arcy, seems to be the only male descendants of any of the Conqueror's barons now remaining among the peers. Lord Holdernesse is the heir of that family.

w Spel. Gloss. in verb. Domesday. X Dug. Bar. vol. i. p. 79.

1bid. Origines Juridiciales, p. 12.

as a degradation of their episcopal dignity; the king infisted, that they were barons, and, on that account, obliged, by the general principles of the feudal law, to attend on him in his great councils. Yet there still remained fome practices, which supposed their title to be derived merely from ancient possession: When a bishop was elected, he sat in parliament before the king had made him restitution of his temporalities; and during the vacancy of a see, the guardian of the spiritualities was summoned to attend along with the bishops.

THE barons were another conflituent part of the great council of the nation. These held immediately of the crown by a military tenure: They were the most honourable members of the state, and had a right to be consulted in all public deliberations: They were the immediate vassals of the crown, and owed as a fervice their attendance in the court of their supreme lord. A resolution, taken without their confent, was likely to be but ill executed: And no determination of any cause or controversy among them had any validity, where the vote and advice of the body did not concur. The dignity of earl or count was official and territorial, as well as hereditary; and as all the earls were also barons, they were considered as miliary vasfals of the crown; were admitted in that capacity into the general council, and formed the most honourable and powerful branch of it.

after

Wes

nth

1000

1,19

But there was another class of the immediate military tenants of the crown, no less or probably more numerous than the barons, the tenants in capite by knights service; and these, however inferior in power or property, held by a tenure, which was equally honourable with that of the others. A barony was commonly composed of several knights sees: And though the number seems not to have been exactly defined, seldom consisted of less than sity

y Spel. Gloff, in verb. Baro,

Appendix hydes of land 2: But where a man held of the king only one or two knights fees, he was still an immediate vasfal of the crown, and as fuch had a title to have a feat in the general councils. But as this attendance was usually esteemed a burthen, and one too great for a man of slender fortune to bear constantly; it is probable, that, though he had a title, if he pleased, to be admitted, he was not obliged, by any penalty, like the barons, to pay a regular attendance. All the immediate military tenants of the crown amounted not fully to 700, when Domesday-book was framed; and as the members were well pleased, on any pretext, to excuse themselves from attendance, the affembly was never likely to become too numerous for the dispatch of public business.

The commons.

So far the nature of a general council or ancient parliament is determined without any doubt or controversy. The only question seems to be with regard to the commons, or the representatives of counties and boroughs; whether they were also, in more early times, constituent parts of parliament? This question was once disputed in England with great acrimony: But fuch is the force of time and evidence, that they can fometimes prevail even over faction; and the question feems, by general confent, and even by their own, to be at last determined against the ruling party. It is agreed, that the commons were no part of the great council, till fome ages after the conquest; and that the military tenants alone of the crown composed that supreme and legislative assembly.

THE vaffals of a baron were by their tenure immediately dependant on him, owed attendance at his court, and paid all their duty to the king, through that depend-

ance

² Four hydes made one knight's fee: The relief of a barony was twelve times greater than that of a knight's fee; whence we may conjecture its usual value. Spelm. Gloff. in verb. Feodum. There were 243 600 hydes in England, and 60,215 knights fees; whence it is evident that there were a little more than four he des in each knight's fee, ance which their lord was obliged by his tenure to acknow- Appendix ledge to his fovereign and superior. Their land, comprehended in the barony, was represented in parliament by the baron himfelf, who was supposed, according to the fictions of the feudal law, to possess the direct property of it; and it would have been deemed incongruous to give it any other representation. They stood in the fame capacity to him, that he and the other barons did to the king: The former were peers of the barony; the latter were peers of the realm: The vaffals poffeffed a fubordinate rank within their diffrict; the baron enjoyed a fuperior dignity in the great affembly: They were in fome degree his companions at home; he the king's companion at court: And nothing can be more evidently repugnant to all feudal ideas, and to that gradual fubordination, which was effential to those ancient institutions, than to imagine that the king would apply either for the advice or confent of men, who were of a rank fo much inferior, and whose duty was immediately paid to the mesne lord, that was interposed between them and the throne a.

If it be unreasonable to think, that the vassals of a barony, though their tenure was military and noble and honourable, were ever summoned to give their opinion in national councils, much less can it be supposed, that the tradesmen or inhabitants of boroughs, whose condition was so much inferior, would be admitted to that privilege. It appears from Domesday, that the greatest boroughs were, at the time of the conquest, scarcely more than country villages; and that the inhabitants lived in entire dependance on the king or great lords, and were of a station little better than servile b. They were not then so much as incorporated; they formed no community; were

² Spelm. Gloff. in verb. Baro.

b Liber bomo anciently fignified a gentleman: For fcarce any one befide was entirely free. Spelm. Gloff, in verbo.

Appendix not regarded as a body politic; and being really nothing but a number of low dependant tradefmen, living, without any particular civil tie, in neighbourhood together, they were incapable of being represented in the states of the kingdom. Even in France, a country which made more early advances in arts and civility than England, the first corporation is fixty years posterior to the conquest under the duke of Normandy; and the erecting of these communities was an invention of Lewis the Gross, in order to free the people from flavery under the lords, and to give them protection, by means of certain privileges and a separate jurisdiction . An ancient French writer calls them a new and wicked device, to procure liberty to flaves, and encourage them in shaking off the dominion of their masters t. The famous charter, as it is called, of the Conqueror to the city of London, though granted at a time when he affumed the appearance of gentleness and lenity, is nothing but a letter of protection, and a declaration that the citizens should not be treated as flaves . By the English feudal law, the superior lord was prohibited from marrying his female ward to a burgefs or a villain f; fo near were these two ranks efteemed to each other, and fo much inferior to the nobility and gentry. Besides possessing the advantages of birth, riches, civil powers and privileges, the nobles and gentlemen alone were armed; a circumstance, which gave them a mighty superiority, in an age when nothing but the military profession was honourable, and when the loose execution of laws gave fo much encouragement to open violence, and rendered it so decisive in all disputes and controversies g.

THE great fimilarity among the feudal governments of Europe is well known to every man, that has any

c Du Cange's Gloff. in verb. commune, communitat. e Stat. of Merton, 1235. cap. 6. de vita sua, lib. 3. cap. 7. 8 Madox's Baron. Angl. p. 19. f Holingshed, vol. iii, p. 15. acquaintance acquaintance with ancient history; and the antiquaries Appendix of all foreign countries, where the question was never embarraffed by party disputes, have allowed, that the commons came very late to be admitted to a share in the legislative power. In Normandy particularly, whose constitution was most likely to be William's model in raising his new fabric of English government, the states were entirely composed of the clergy and nobility; and the first incorporated boroughs or communities of that dutchy were Rouen and Falaise, which enjoyed their privileges by a grant of Philip Augustus in the year 1207 h. All the ancient English historians, when they mention the great council of the nation, call it an affembly of the baronage, nobility, or great men; and none of their expressions, though several hundred passages might be produced, can, without the utmost violence, be tortured to a meaning, which will admit the commons to be conftituent members of that body i. If in the long period of 200 years, which elapsed between the Conquest and the latter end of Henry III. and which abounded in factions, revolutions, and convulfions of all kinds, the house of commons never performed one fingle legislative act, fo confiderable as to be once mentioned by any of the numerous historians of that age, they must have been totally

ty ti

andi

In

but

MIN.

1 20

cha

emi

m

521

21

h Norman. Du Chesnii, p. 1066. Du Cange Gloss. in verb. commune.

i Sometimes the historians mention the people, populus, as a part of the parliament: But they always mean the laity, in opposition to the clergy. Sometimes, the word, communitas, is found; but it always means communitas baronagii. These points are clearly proved by Dr. Brady. There is also mention sometimes made of a crowd or multitude that thronged into the great council on particular interesting occasions; but as deputies from boroughs are never once fooke of, the proof, that they had not then any existence, becomes the most certain and undeniable. These never could make a crowd, as they must have had a regular place assigned them, if they had made a regular part of the legislative body. There were only 130 boroughs who received writs of fummons from Edward I. It is expressly faid in Gesta Reg. Steph. p. 932, that it was usual for the populace, vulgus, to crowd into the great councils; where they were plainly mere spectators, and could only gratify their curiofity. 14 infignifi-

Appendix infignificant.: And in that case, what reason can be assigned for their ever being affembled? Can it be supposed, that men of so little weight or importance possessed a negative voice against the king and the barons? Every page of the subsequent histories discovers their existence; though these histories are not written with greater accuracy than the preceding ones, and indeed scarcely equal them in that particular. The Magna Charta of king John provides, that no scutage or aid should be imposed, either on the land or towns, but by consent of the great council; and for more security, it enumerates the persons entitled to a seat in that assembly, the prelates and immediate tenants of the crown, without any mention of the commons: An authority so full, certain, and explicite, that nothing but the zeal of party could ever have pro-

IT was probably the example of the French barons, which first emboldened the English to require greater independance from their sovereign: It is also probable, that the boroughs and corporations of England were established in imitation of those of France. It may, therefore, be proposed as no unlikely conjecture, that both the chief privileges of the peers in England and the liberty of the commons were originally the growth of that so-reign country.

cured credit to any contrary hypothesis.

In ancient times, men were little folicitous to obtain a place in the legislative assemblies; and rather regarded their attendance as a burden, which was not compensated by any return of profit or honour, proportionate to the trouble and expence. The only reason for instituting those public councils, was; on the part of the subject, that they desired some security from the attempts of arbitrary power; and on the part of the sovereign, that he despaired of governing men of such independant spirits without their own consent and concurrence. But the commons, or the inhabitants of boroughs, had not as yet Appendix reached fuch a degree of confideration, as to defire fecurity against their prince, or to imagine, that, even if they were affembled in a reprefentative body, they had power or rank fufficient to enforce it. The only protection, which they aspired to, was against the immediate violence and injuffice of their fellow-citizens; and this advantage each of them looked for, from the courts of justice, or from the authority of some great lord, to whom, by law or his own choice, he was attached. On the other hand, the fovereign was fufficiently affured of obedience in the whole community, if he procured the concurrence of the nobles; nor had he reason to apprehend, that any order of the state could refist his and their united authority. The military fub-vaffals could entertain no idea of oppofing both their prince and their superiors: The burgesses and tradefmen could much less aspire to such a thought: And thus, even if history were filent on the head, we have reason to conclude, from the known situation of society during those ages, that the commons were never admitted as members of the legislative body.

THE executive power of the Anglo-Norman government was lodged in the king. Besides the stated meetings of the national council at the three great sessivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, he was accustomed, on any sudden exigence, to summon them together. He could at his pleasure command the attendance of his barons and their vassals, in which consisted the military force of the kingdom; and could employ them, during forty days, either in resisting a foreign enemy, or reducing his rebellious subjects. And what was of great importance, the whole judicial power was ultimately in his hands, and was exercised by officers and ministers of his appointment.

¹ Dugd. Orig. Jurid. p. 15. Spelm, Gloff. in verbo parliamentum.

Appendix II. Judicial power. The general plan of the Anglo-Norman government was, that the court of barony was appointed to decide fuch controversies as arose between the several vassals or subjects of the same barony; the hundred-court and county-court, which were still continued as during the Saxon times m, to judge between the subjects of different baronies n; and the curia Regis or king's court, to give sentence among the barons themselves o. But this plan, though simple, was attended with some circumstances, which, being derived from a very extensive authority, assumed by the Conqueror, contributed to increase the royal prerogative; and as long as the state was not disturbed by arms, reduced every order of the community to some degree of dependance and subordination.

THE king himself often sat in his court, which always attended his person P: He there heard causes and pronounced judgment q; and though he was affished by the advice of the other members, it is not to be imagined that a decision could easily be obtained contrary to his inclination or opinion. In his absence the chief justiciary presided, who was the first magistrate in the state, and a kind of viceroy, on whom depended all the civil affairs

m Ang. Sacra, vol. i. p. 334, &c. Dugd. Orig. Jurid. p. 27. 29. Madox Hist. of Exch. p. 75, 76. Spelm. Gloss. in verbo bundred.

o Brady Pref. p. 143. P Madox Hift of Exch. p. 103. 9 Bractonlib. 3. cap. 9. § z. cap. 10. § z.

n None of the feudal governments in Europe had such institutions as the county-courts, which the great authority of the Conqueror still retained from the Saxon customs. All the freeholders of the county, even the greatest barons, were obliged to attend the sherists in these courts, and to assist them in the administration of justice. By this means, they received frequent and sensible admonitions of their dependance on the king or supreme magistrate: They formed a kind of community with their sellow barons and freeholders. They were often drawn from their individual and independant state, peculiar to the feudal system; and were made members of a political body: And perhaps, this institution of county-courts in England has had greater effects on the government, than has yet been distinctly pointed out by historians or graced by antiquaries. The barons were never able to free themselves from this attendance on the sherists and itinerant justices till the reign of Henry III.

of the kingdom. The other chief officers of the crown, the conftable, marefchal, fenefchal, chamberlain, treafurer, and chancellor, were members, together with fuch feudal barons as thought proper to attend, and the barons of the exchequer, who at first were also feudal barons, appointed by the king. This court, which was sometimes called the King's court, sometimes the court of Exchequer, judged in all causes, civil and criminal, and comprehended the whole business, which is now shared out among sour courts, the Chancery, the King's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer.

Such an accumulation of powers was itself a great fource of authority, and rendered the jurisdiction of the court formidable to all the fubjects; but the turn, which judicial trials took foon after the Conquest, served still more to increase its authority, and to augment the royal prerogatives. William, among the other violent changes. which he attempted and effected, had introduced the Norman law into England w, had ordered all the pleadings to be in that tongue, and had interwoven, with the English jurisprudence, all the maxims and principles. which the Normans, more advanced in cultivation, and naturally litigious, were accustomed to observe in the distribution of justice. Law now became a science, which at first fell entirely into the hands of the Normans; and which, even after it was communicated to the English, required so much study and application, that the laity, in those ignorant ages, were incapable of attaining it, and it was a mystery almost solely confined to the clergy, and chiefly to the monks *. The great

p. 123.

officers

t Spelm. Gloff. in verbo jufticiarii.

s Madox Hift. Exch. p. 27.

29. 33. 38. 41. 54. The Normans introduced the practice of fealing charters; and the chancellor's office was to keep the Great Seal. Ingulph.

Dugd p. 33, 34.

t Madox Hift. of the Exch. p. 134, 135. Gerv.

Dorob. p. 1387.

u Madox Hift. of the Exch. p. 56. 70.

w Dial.

de Scac, p. 20. apud Madox Hift. of the Exchequer.

x Malmef. lib. 4.

Appendix officers of the crown and the feudal barons, who were II.

military men, found themselves unfit to penetrate into those obscurities; and though they were entitled to a seat in the supreme judicature, the business of the court was wholly managed by the chief justiciary and the law barons, who were men appointed by the king, and entirely at his disposal r. This natural course of things was forwarded by the multiplicity of business, which slowed into that court, and which daily augmented by the appeals from all the subordinate judicatures of the kingdom.

In the Saxon times, no appeal was received in the king's court, except upon the denial or delay of justice by the inferior courts; and the fame practice was still observed in most of the feudal kingdoms of Europe. But the great power of the Conqueror established at first in England an authority, which the monarchs in France were not able to attain till the reign of St. Lewis, who lived near two centuries after: He empowered his court to receive appeals both from the courts of barony and the county-courts, and by that means brought the adminifration of justice ultimately into the hands of the sovereign z. And lest the expence or trouble of a journey to court should discourage suitors, and make them acquiesce in the decision of the inferior judicatures, itinerant judges were afterwards established, who made their circuits throughout the kingdom, and tried all causes that were brought before them a. By this expedient, the courts of barony were kept in awe; and if they still prey Dugd, Orig. Jurid. p. 25. 3 Madox Hist. of the Exch. p. 65. Glanv. lib. 12. cap. 1. 7. LL. Hen. I. § 31. apud Wilkins, p. 248. Fitz Stephens, p. 36. Coke's Comment. on the Statute of Mulbridge, cap. 20.

a Madox Hift, of the Exch. p. 83, 84. 100. Gerv. Dorob. p. 1410. What made the Anglo-Norman barons more readily submit to appeals from their court to the King's court of Exchequer, was, their being accustomed to like appeals in Normandy to the ducal court of Exchequer. See Gilbert's History of the Exchequer, p. 1, 2.; though the author thinks it doubtful, whether the Norman court was not rather copied from the English, p. 6.

ferved fome influence, it was only from the apprehensions, which the vasials might entertain, of disobliging their superior, by appealing from his jurisdiction. But the county-courts were much discredited; and as the free-holders were found ignorant of the intricate principles and forms of the new law, the lawyers gradually brought all business before the king's judges, and abandoned the ancient simple and popular judicature. After this manner, the formalities of justice, which, though they appear tedious and cumbersome, are found requisite to the support of liberty in all monarchical governments, proved at first, by a combination of causes, very advantageous to royal authority in England.

The power of the Norman kings was also much sup-Revenue of ported by a great revenue; and by a revenue, that was the crown. fixed, perpetual, and independant of the subject. The people, without betaking themselves to arms, had no check upon the king, and no regular security for the due administration of justice. In those days of violence, many instances of oppression passed unheeded; and soon after were openly pleaded as precedents, which it was unlawful to dispute or controul. Princes and ministers were too ignorant to be themselves sensible of the advantages attending an equitable administration; and there was no established council or assembly which could protect the people, and, by withdrawing supplies, regularly and peaceably admonish the king of his duty, and ensure the execution of the laws.

THE first branch of the king's stated revenue was the royal demesnes or crown-lands, which were very extensive, and comprehended, beside a great number of manors, most of the chief cities of the kingdom. It was established by law, that the king could alienate no part of his demesne, and that he himself, or his successor, could, at any time, resume such donations b: But this law was

b Fleta, lib. 1, cap. 8. § 17. lib. 3. cap. 6. § 3. Bracton, lib. 2. cap. 5.

Appendix never regularly observed; which happily rendered in the crown somewhat more dependant. The rent of the crown-lands, considered merely as so much riches, was a source of power: The influence of the king over his tenants and the inhabitants of his towns, encreased this power: But the other numerous branches of his revenue, besides supplying his treasury, gave, by their very nature, a great latitude to arbitrary authority, and were a support of the prerogative; as will appear from an enumeration of them.

THE king was never content with the stated rents, but levied heavy talliages at pleafure on the inhabitants both of town and country, who lived within his demefne. All bargains of fale, in order to prevent theft, being prohibited, except in boroughs and public markets c, he pretended to exact tolls on all goods which were there fold d. He feized two hogsheads, one before and one behind the mast, from every vessel that imported wine. All goods payed to his customs a proportional part of their value : Passage over bridges and on rivers was loaded with tolls at pleasure f: And though the boroughs by degrees brought the liberty of farming these impositions, yet the revenue profited by these bargains, new fums were often exacted for the renewal and confirmation of their charters s, and the people were thus held in perpetual dependance.

Such was the fituation of the inhabitants within the royal demesnes. But the possessors of land, or the military tenants, though they were better protected, both by law, and by the great privilege of carrying arms, were, from the nature of their tenures, much exposed to the inroads of power, and possessed not what we should

c LU. Will. 1. cap. 61. d Madox, p. 570. c Ibid.
p. 529. This author fays a fifteenth. But it is not easy to reconcile this account to other authorities. f Madox, p. 529. g Madox's Hift. of the Exch. p. 275, 276, 277, &c.

efteem in our age a very durable fecurity. The Conqueror ordained, that the barons should be obliged to pay nothing beyond their stated services, except a reasonable aid to ransom his person if he were taken in war, to make his eldest son a knight, and to marry his eldest daughter. What should, on these occasions, be deemed a reasonable aid, was not determined; and the demands of the crown were so far discretionary.

THE king could require in war the personal attendance of his vaffals, that is, of almost all the landed proprietors; and if they declined the fervice, they were obliged to pay him a composition in money, which was called a scutage. The sum was, during some reigns, precarious and uncertain; it was fometimes levied without allowing the vaffal the liberty of perfonal fervice h; and it was a usual artifice of the king's to pretend an expedition, that he might be entitled to levy the fcutage from his military tenants. Danegelt was another species of land-tax levied by the early Norman kings, arbitrarily, and contrary to the laws of the Conqueror i. Moneyage was also a general land-tax of the same nature, levied by the two first Norman kings, and abolished by the charter of Henry I. * It was a shilling paid every three years by each hearth, to induce the king not to use his prerogative in debasing the coin. Indeed, it appears from that charter, that, though the Conqueror had granted his military tenants an immunity from all taxes and talliages, he and his fon William had never thought themselves bound to observe that rule, but had levied impositions at pleasure on all the landed estates of the kingdom. The utmost that Henry grants, is, that the land cultivated by the military tenant himself shall not be so burdened; but he referves the power of taxing the farmers: And as it is g LL. Will. Conq. § 55.

h Gervase de Tilbury, p. 25.

Madox's Hift, of the Exch. p. 475.

k Matth. Paris, p. 38.

Appendix known, that Henry's charter was never observed in any one article, we may be affured, that this prince and his fuccessors retracted even this small indulgence, and levied arbitrary impositions on all the lands of all their subjects. These taxes were sometimes very heavy; fince Malmesbury tells us, that, in the reign of William Rufus, the farmers, on account of them, abandoned tillage, and a famine enfued 1.

> THE escheats were a great branch both of power and of revenue, especially during the first reigns after the conquest. In default of posterity from the first baron, his land reverted to the crown, and continually augmented the king's possessions. The prince had indeed by law a power of alienating these escheats; but by this means he had an opportunity of establishing the fortunes of his friends and fervants, and thereby enlarging his authority. Sometimes he retained them in his own hands; and they were gradually confounded with the royal demesnes, and became difficult to be distinguished from them. This confusion is probably the reason why the king acquired the right of alienating his demesnes.

> Bur besides escheats from default of heirs, those which enfued from crimes or breach of duty towards the fuperior lord, were frequent in ancient times. If the vaffal, being thrice summoned to attend his superior's court, and do fealty, neglected or refused obedience, he forfeited all title to his land m. If he denied his tenure, or refused his fervice, he was exposed to the same penalty n. If he fold his estate without licence from his lord o, or if he fold it upon any other tenure or title than that by which he himself held it p, he lost all right to it. The adhering to his lord's enemies q, deferting him in war r, betraying Appendix his fecrets s, debauching his wife or his near relations t, or even using indecent freedoms with them ", might be punished by forseiture. The higher crimes, rapes, robbery, murder, arfon, &c. were called felony; and being interpreted want of fidelity to his lord, made him lose his fief w. Even where the felon was vastal to a baron, though his immediate lord enjoyed the forfeiture, the king might retain possession of his estate during a twelvemonth, and had the right of spoiling and deftroying it, unless the baron paid him a reasonable composition x. We have not here enumerated all the species of felonies, or of crimes by which forfeiture was incurred . We have faid enough to prove, that the possession of feudal property was anciently fomewhat precarious, and that the primary idea was never loft, of its being a kind of fee or benefice.

¹ So also Chron. Abb. St. Petri de Burgo, p. 55. Knyghton, p. 2366. n Lib. Feud. lib. 3. m Hottom. de Feud. Difp, cap. 38. col. 886. 9 Lib. Feud. lib. I, tit. 21. tit. 1.; lib. 4. tit. 21. 39.

P Id, lib. 4. tit. 44.

When a baron died, the king immediately took posfession of the estate; and the heir, before he recovered his right, was obliged to make application to the crown, and desire that he might be admitted to do homage for his land, and pay a composition to the king. This composition was not at first fixed by law, at least by practice: The king was often exorbitant in his demands, and kept possession of the land till they were complied with.

Ir the heir were a minor, the king retained the whole profit of the effate till his majority; and might grant what sum he thought proper for the education and maintenance of the young baron. This practice was also founded on the notion, that a fief was a benefice, and that, while the heir could not perform his military ser-

q Lib. Feud. lib. 3. tit. 1. r id. lib. 4. tit. 14. 21.

s Id. lib. 4. tit. 14. r Id. lib. 1. tit. 14. 21. u Id. lib. 1.
tit. 1. w Spelm. Gloff. in verb. Felonia. x Spelm. Gloff. in verb. Felonia. Glanville, lib. 7. cap. 17.

Appendix vices, the revenue devolved to the superior, who employed another in his stead. It is obvious, that a great proportion of the landed property must, by means of this device, be continually in the hands of the prince, and that all the noble families were thereby held in perpetual dependance. When the king granted the wardship of a rich heir to any one, he had the opportunity of enriching a favourite or minister: If he fold it, he thereby levied a considerable sum of money. Simon de Mountfort paid Henry III. 10,000 marks, an immense sum in those days, for the wardship of Gilbert de Umfrevile y. Geoffrey de Mandeville payed to the same prince the sum of 20,000 marks, that he might marry Isabel counters of Gloucester, and possess all her lands and knights sees. This sum would be equivalent to 200,000, perhaps 400,000 pounds in our time z.

Ir the heir were a female, the king was entitled to offer her any husband of her rank he thought proper; and if she refused him, she forfeited her land. Even a male heir could not marry without the royal consent, and it was usual for men to pay large sums for the liberty of making their own choice in marriage a. No man could dispose of his land, either by sale or will, without the consent of his superior. The possessor was never considered as sull proprietor: He was still a kind of beneficiary; and could not oblige his superior to accept of any vassal, that was not agreeable to him.

Fines, amerciaments, and oblatas, as they were called, were another confiderable branch of the royal power and revenue. The ancient records of the exchequer, which are still preserved, give surprizing accounts of the numerous sines and amerciaments levied in those days b, and of the strange inventions sallen upon to exact money from a Id. p. 320. b Id. p. 272.

y Madox's Hist. of the Exch. p. 223. 2 Ic. p. 322.

the fubject. It appears, that the ancient kings of England Appendix put themselves entirely on the foot of the barbarous eastern princes, whom no man must approach without a present, who fell all their good offices, and who intrude themselves into every bufiness, that they may have a pretence for extorting money. Even justice was avowedly bought and fold; the king's court itself, though the supreme judicature of the kingdom, was open to none that brought not prefents to the king; the bribes given for the expedition, delay c, fuspension, and, doubtless, for the perversion of justice, were entered in the public registers of the royal revenue, and remain as monuments of the perpetual iniquity and tyranny of the times. The barons of the exchequer, for instance, the first nobility of the kingdom, were not ashamed to insert, as an article in their records, that the county of Norfolk paid a fum, that they might be fairly dealt with d; the borough of Yarmouth, that the king's charters, which they have for their liberties, might not be violated e; Richard, fon of Gilbert, for the king's helping him to recover his debt from the Jews f; Serlo, fon of Terlavaston, that he might be permitted to make his defence, in case he were accused of a certain homicide & Walter de Burton for free law, if accused of wounding another h: Robert de Effart, for having an inquest to find whether Roger, the butcher, and Wace and Humphrey, accused him of robbery and theft out of envy and ill-will, or not i; William Buhurst, for having an inquest to find whether he were accused of the death of one Godwin out of ill-will or for just cause k. I have selected these few instances from a great number of a like kind, which Madox had selected from a still greater number, preserved in the ancient rolls of the exchequer 1.

c Madox's Hift. of Exch. p. 274. 309. d Id. p. 295.

e Id. ibid. f Id. p. 296. He paid 200 marks, a great sum in those days. g Id. p. 296. h Id. ibid. i Id. p. 298.

k Id. p. 302. 1 Chap. xii.

Appendix II.

Sometimes the party litigant offered the king a certain portion, a half, a third, a fourth, payable out of the debts, which he, as the executor of justice, should assist him in recovering m. Theophania de Westland agreed to pay the half of 212 marks, that she might recover that sum against James de Fughlesson n; Solomon the Jew engaged to pay one mark out of every seven that he should recover against Hugh de la Hose o; Nicholas Morrel promised to pay sixty pounds, that the earl of Flanders might be distrained to pay him 343 pounds, which the earl had taken from him; and these sixty pounds were to be paid out of the first money that Nicholas should recover from the earl p.

As the king assumed the entire power over trade, he was to be paid for a permission to exercise commerce or industry of any kind q. Hugh Oisel paid 400 marks for liberty to trade in England : Nigel de Havene gave fifty marks for the partnership in merchandize which he had with Gervase de Hanton : The men of Worcester paid 100 shillings, that they might have the liberty of selling and buying dyed cloth, as formerly t: Several other towns paid for a like liberty u. The commerce indeed of the kingdom was so much under the controul of the king, that he erected gilds, corporations, and monopolies, wherever he pleased; and levied sums for these exclusive privileges w.

THERE were no profits fo fmall as to be below the king's attention. Henry, fon of Arthur, gave ten dogs, to have a recognition against the counters of Copland for one knight's fee *. Roger, fon of Nicholas, gave twenty lampreys and twenty shads for an inquest to find, whether

m Madox's Hist. of Exch. p. 311. n Id. ibid. o Id. p. 79.
312. p Id. p. 312. q Id. p. 323, r Id. ibid.
s Id. ibid. t Id. p. 324. u Id. ibid. w Id. p. 232.
233, &c. x Id. p. 298.

Gilbert, son of Alured, gave to Roger 200 muttons to Obtain his confirmation for certain lands, or whether Roger took them from him by violence?: Geoffrey Fitz-Pierre, the chief justiciary, gave two good Norway hawks, that Walter le Madine might have leave to export a hundred weight of cheese out of the king's dominions.

It is really amusing to remark the strange business in which the king sometimes interfered, and never without a present: The wise of Hugh de Nevile gave the king 200 hens, that she might lie with her husband one night a; and she brought with her two sureties, who answered each for a hundred hens. It is probable that her husband was a prisoner, which debarred her from having access to him. The abbot of Rucford paid ten marks, for leave to erect houses and place men upon his land near Welhang, in order to secure his wood there from being stolen b: Hugh archdeacon of Wells, gave one tun of wine for leave to carry 600 summs of corn whither he would c: Peter de Perariis gave twenty marks for leave to salt sishes, as Peter Chevalier used to do d.

IT was usual to pay high fines, in order to gain the king's good-will, or mitigate his anger. In the reign of Henry II. Gilbert, the son of Fergus, fines in 919 pounds 9 shillings to obtain that prince's favour; William de Chataignes a thousand marks that he would remit his displeasure. In the reign of Henry III. the city of London fines in no less a sum than 20,000 pounds on the same account.

THE king's protection and good offices of every kind were bought and fold. Robert Grislet paid twenty marks of filver, that the king would help him against the earl of Mortaigne in a certain pleas: Robert de Cundet gave

Appendix thirty marks of filver, that the king would bring him to an accord with the bishop of Lincoln 8: Ralph de Breckham gave a hawk, that the king would protect him h; and this is a very frequent reason for payments: John, fon of Ordgar, gave a Norway hawk, to have the king's request to the king of Norway to let him have his brother Godard's chattels i: Richard de Neville gave twenty palfreys to obtain the king's request to Isolda Bisset, that The should take him for a husband k: Roger Fitz-Walter gave three good palfreys to have the king's letter to Roger Bertram's mother, that she should marry him1: Eling, the dean, paid 100 marks, that his whore and his children might be let out upon bail ": The bishop of Winchefter gave one tun of good wine for his not putting the king in mind to give a girdle to the counters of Albemarle ": Robert de Veaux gave five of the best palfreys, that the king would hold his tongue about Henry Pinel's wife o. There are in the records of exchequer many other fingular inftances of a like nature p. It will however

> g Madox's Hift. of Exch. p. 330. h Id. p. 332 k Id. p. 333. I Id. ibid. m Id. i Id. ibid. P. 342. Pro babenda amica sua & filiis, &c. n Id. p. 352.

o Id. ibid. Ut rex taceret de uxore Henrici Pinel.

P We shall gratify the reader's curiosity by subjoining a few more instances from Madox, p. 332. Hugh Oifel was to give the king two robes of a good green colour, to have the king's letters patent to the merchants of Flanders with a request to render him 1000 marks, which he lost in Flanders. The abbot of Hyde paid thirty marks, to have the king's letters of request to the archbishop of Canterbury, to remove certain monks that were against the abbot. Roger de Trihanton paid twenty marks and a palfrey, to have the king's request to Richard de Umfreville to give him his fister to wife, and to the fifter that she would accept of him for a husband : William de Cheveringworth paid five marks, to have the king's letter to the abbot of Perfore, to let him enjoy peaceably his tythes as formerly; Matthew de Hereford, clerk, paid ten marks for a letter of request to the bishop of Landast, to let him enjoy peaceably his church of Schenfrith; Andrew Neulun gave three Flemish caps, for the king's request to the prior of Chikefand, for performance of an agreement made between them; Henry de Fontibus gave a Lombardy horse of value ever be just to remark, that the fame ridiculous practices Appendix and dangerous abuses prevailed in Normandy, and probably in all the other states of Europe 9. England was not in this respect more barbarous than its neighbours.

THESE iniquitous practices of the Norman kings were fo well known, that, on the death of Hugh Bigod, in the reign of Henry II. the best and most just of these princes, the eldest fon and the widow of this nobleman came to court, and strove, by offering large presents to the king, each of them to acquire possession of that rich inheritance. The king was fo equitable as to order the cause to be tried by the great council! But, in the mean time, he seized all the money and treasure of the deceased. Peter of Blois, a judicious, and even an elegant writer for that age, gives a pathetic description of the venality of justice and the oppressions of the poor, under the reign of Henry: And he fcruples not to complain to the king himfelf of these abuses . We may judge what the case would be under the government of worse princes. The articles of enquiry concerning the conduct of sheriffs, which Henry promulgated in 1170, show the great power as well as the licentiousness of these officers t.

AMERCIAMENTS or fines for crimes and trespasses were another confiderable branch of the royal revenue ". Most value, to have the king's request to Henry Fitz-Hervey, that he would give him his daughter to wife: Roger, fon of Nicholas, promifed all the lamprey's he could get, to have the king's request to earl William Mareshal, that he would grant him the manor of Langeford at Ferm. The burgeffes of Glocefter promifed 300 lampreys, that they might not be diffrained to find the prisoners of Poictou with necessaries, unless they pleased. Id. p. 352. Jordan, fon of Reginald, paid twenty marks to have the king's request to William Paniel, that he would grant him the land of Mill Nierenvit, and the cuffody of his heirs; and if Jordan obtained the fame, he was to pay the twenty marks, otherwise not. Id. p. 333.

r Bened. Abb. p. 180, 181. 9 Madox's Hift. of Exch. p. 359.

s Petri Blef. Epist. 95. apud Bibl. Patrum, tom. 24. p. 2014.

u Madox, chap. xiv. t Hoveden, Chron. Gerv. p. 1410.

Appendix crimes were atoned for by money; the fines imposed were not limited by any rule or statute; and frequently occafioned the total ruin of the person, even for the slightest trespasses. The forest-laws, particularly, were a great fource of oppression. The king possessed fixty-eight forests, thirteen chaces, and seven hundred and eightyone parks, in different parts of England w; and confidering the extreme passion of the English and Normans for hunting, these were so many snares laid for the people, by which they were allured into trespasses, and brought within the reach of arbitrary and rigorous laws, which the king had thought proper to enact by his own authority.

But the most barefaced acts of tyranny and oppression were practifed against the Jews, who were entirely out of the protection of law, were extremely odious from the bigotry of the people, and were abandoned to the immeafurable rapacity of the king and his ministers. Besides many other indignities, to which they were continually exposed, it appears, that they were once all thrown into prison, and the sum of 66,000 marks exacted for their liberty x: At another time, Isaac the Jew paid alone 5100 marks y; Brun, 3000 marks z; Jurnet, 2000; Bennet, 500: At another, Licorica, widow of David, the Jew of Oxford, was required to pay 6000 marks; and she was delivered over to fix of the richest and discreetest Jews in England, who were to answer for the sum a. Henry III. borrowed 5000 marks from the earl of Cornwal; and for his repayment configned over to him all the Jews in England b. The revenue arifing from exactions upon this nation was fo confiderable, that there was a particular court of exchequer fet apart for managing it c.

w Spelm. Gloff. in verbo Foreffa. x Madox's Hift. of the Exch. p. 151. This happened in the reign of king John. y Id. p. 151. 2 Ic. p. 153. a Id. p. 168. b Id. p. 156. c Id. chap. vii.

WE may judge concerning the low state of commerce Appendix among the English, when the Jews, notwithstanding these oppressions, could still find their account in trading Commerce among them, and lending them money. And as the improvements of agriculture were also much checked, by the immense possessions of the nobility, by the disorders of the times, and by the precarious state of seudal property; it appears, that industry of no kind could then have place in the kingdom d.

IT is afferted by Sir Harry Spellmane, as an undoubted truth, that, during the reigns of the first Norman princes, every edict of the king, iffued with the confent of his privy-council, had the full force of law. But the barons furely were not fo passive as to entrust a power, entirely arbitrary and despotic, into the hands of the sovereign. It only appears, that the constitution had not fixed any precise boundaries to the royal power; that the right of iffuing proclamations on any emergence and of exacting obedience to them, a right which was always supposed inherent in the crown, is very difficult to be diffinguished from a legislative authority; that the extreme imperfection of the ancient laws, and the fudden exigencies, which often occurred in fuch turbulent gevernments, obliged the prince to exert frequently the latent powers of his prerogative; that he naturally proceeded, from the acquiescence of the people, to assume, in many particulars of moment, an authority, from which

d We learn from the extracts given us of Domesday by Brady in his Treatife of Boroughs, that almost all the boroughs of England had suffered in the shock of the Conquest, and had extremely decayed between the death of the Confessor, and the time when Domesday was framed.

e Gloss. in verb. judicium Dei. The author of the Miroir des justices, complains, that ordinances are only made by the king and his clerks, and by aliens and others, who dars not contradict the king, but study to please him. Whence, he concludes, laws are oftener dictated by will than founded on right.

Appendix he had excluded himself by express statutes, charters, or concessions, and which was, in the main, repugnant to the general genius of the constitution; and that the lives, the personal liberty, and the properties of all his subjects were less secured by law against the exertion of his arbitrary authority, than by the independant power and private connexion of each individual. It appears from the great charter itself, that not only John, a tyrannical prince, and Richard, a violent one, but their father, Henry, under whose reign the prevalence of gross abuses is the least to be suspected, were accustomed, from their sole authority, without process of law, to imprison, banish, and attaint the freemen of their kingdom.

A GREAT baron, in ancient times, considered himself as a kind of fovereign within his territory; and was attended by courtiers and dependants more zealously attached to him than the ministers of state and the great officers were commonly to their fovereign. He often maintained in his court the parade of royalty, by establishing a justiciary, constable, mareschal, chamberlain, seneschal, and chancellor, and affigning to each of these officers a separate province and command. He was usually very affiduous in exercifing his jurifdiction; and took fuch delight in that image of fovereignty, that it was found necessary to restrain his activity, and prohibit him by law from holding courts too frequently e. It is not to be doubted, but the example, fet him by the prince, of a mercenary and fordid extortion, would be faithfully copied; and that all his good and bad offices, his justice and injustice, were equally put to fale. He had the power, with the king's confent, to exact talliages even from the free-citizens who lived within his barony; and as his necessities made him rapacious, his authority was usually found to be more oppressive and tyrannical than that of the sovereign f. He was ever engaged in hereditary or personal animosities or Confederacies with his neighbours, and often gave protection to all desperate adventurers and criminals, who could be useful in serving his violent purposes. He was able alone, in times of tranquillity, to obstruct the execution of justice within his territories; and by combining with a few malcontent barons of high rank and power, he could throw the state into convulsions. And on the whole, though the royal authority was confined within bounds, and often within very narrow ones, yet the check was irregular, and frequently the source of great disorders; nor was it derived from the liberty of the people, but from the military power of many petty tyrants, who were equally dangerous to the prince and oppressive to the subject.

C Dugd. Jurid. Orig. p. 26.

f Madox Hift, of Exch. p. 520.

THE power of the church was another rampart against The church. royal authority; but this defence was also the cause of many mischiefs and inconveniencies. The dignified clergy, perhaps, were not so prone to immediate violence as the barons; but as they pretended to a total independance on the state, and could always cover themselves with the appearances of religion, they proved, in one refpect, an obstruction to the settlement of the kingdom, and to the regular execution of the laws. The policy of the conqueror was in this particular liable to some exception. He augmented the fuperstitious veneration for Rome, to which that age was fo much inclined; and he broke those bands of connexion, which, in the Saxon times, had preferved an union between the lay and the clerical orders. He prohibited the bishops from sitting in the county-courts; he allowed ecclefiaftical causes to be tried in spiritual courts only s; and he so much exalted the power of the clergy, that of 60,215 knights fees, into g Char. Will. apud Wilkins, p. 230. Spel. Conc. vol. ii. p. 14.

Appendix which he divided England, he placed no less than 28,015

Civil laws.

Manners.

THE right of primogeniture was introduced with the feudal law: An inflitution, which is hurtful by producing and maintaining an unequal division of private property; but is advantageous, in another respect, by acustoming the people to a preference in favour of the eldeft fon, and thereby preventing a partition or disputed succession in the monarchy. The Normans introduced the use of firnames, which tend to preserve the knowledge of families and pedigrees. They abolished none of the old abfurd methods of trial, by the cross or ordeal; and they added a new absurdity, the trial by fingle combat i, which became a regular part of jurifprudence, and was conducted with all the order, method, devotion, and folemnity imaginable k. The ideas of chivalry also feem to have been imported by the Normans: No traces of those fantastic notions are to be found among the plain and rustic Saxons. The feudal inflitutions, by raifing the military tenants to a kind of fovereign dignity, by rendering personal strength and valour requisite, and by making every knight and baron his own protector and avenger, begat that martial pride and fense of honour, which, being cultivated and embellished by the poets and romance writers of the age, ended in chivalry. The virtuous knight fought not only in his own quarrel; but in that of the innocent, of the helpless, and above all, of the fair, whom he supposed to be for ever under the guardianship of his valiant arm. The uncourteous knight, who, from his castle, exercised robbery

6

h Spel. Gloff, in verb. manus mortua. We are not to imagine, as some have done, that the church possessed lands in this proportion, but only that they and their vassals enjoyed such a proportionable part of the landed property.

i LL. Will. cap. 68.

k Spel. Gloss. in verb. campus. The last instance of these duels was in the, 15th of Eliz. So long did that absurdity remain.

robbery on travellers, and committed violence on virgins, Appendix was the object of his perpetual indignation; and he put him to death, without scruple or trial or appeal, wherever he met with him. The great independance of men made personal honour and fidelity the chief tie among them; and rendered it the capital virtue of every true knight, or genuine professor of chivalry. The solemnities of single combat, as established by law, banished the notion of every thing unfair or unequal in rencounters; and maintained an appearance of courtefy between the combatants, till the moment of their engagement. The credulity of the age grafted on this stock the notion of giants, enchanters, dragons, fpells 1, and a thoufand wonders, which still multiplied during the times of the Crusades; when men, returning from fo great a distance, used the liberty of imposing every fiction on their believing audience. These ideas of chivalry infected the writings, conversation, and behaviour of men, during some ages; and even after they were, in a great measure, banished by the revival of learning, they left modern gallantry and the point of honour, which still maintain their influence, and are the genuine offspring of those ancient affectations.

The concession of the Great Charter, or rather its sull establishment (for there was a considerable interval of time between the one and the other), gave rise, by degrees, to a new species of government, and introduced some order and justice into the administration. The ensuing scenes of our history are therefore somewhat different from the preceding. Yet the Great Charter contained no establishment of new courts, magistrates, or senates, nor abolition of the old. It introduced no new distribution of the powers of the commonwealth, and no innovation in the political or public law of the kingdom.

I In all legal fingle combats, it was part of the champion's oath, that he carried not about him any herb, spell, or inchantment, by which he might procure victory. Dugd. Orig. Jurid. p. 82.

Appendix It only guarded, and that merely by verbal clauses, _against fuch tyrannical practices as are incompatible with civilized government, and, if they become very frequent, are incompatible with all government. The barbarous licence of the kings, and perhaps of the nobles, was thenceforth fomewhat more restrained: Men acquired some more security for their properties and their liberties: And government approached a little nearer to that end. for which it was originally inflituted, the distribution of justice, and the equal protection of the citizens. Acts of violence and iniquity in the crown, which before were only deemed injurious to individuals, and were hazardous chiefly in proportion to the number, power, and dignity of the persons affected by them, were now regarded, in fome degree, as public injuries, and as infringements of a charter, calculated for general fecurity. And thus, the establishment of the Great Charter, without seeming anywife to innovate in the distribution of political power, became a kind of epoch in the constitution.

CHAP. XII.

HENRY III.

Settlement of the government—General pacification
—Death of the Protector—Some commotions
—Hubert de Burgh displaced—The bishop of Winchester minister—King's partiality to foreigners
—Grievances—Ecclesiastical grievances—
Earl of Cornwal elected king of the Romans—Discontent of the barons—Simon de Mountfort earl of Leicester—Provisions of Oxford—Usurpation of the barons—Prince Edward—Civil wars of the barons—Reference to the king of France—
Renewal of the civil wars—Battle of Lewes—
House of commons—Battle of Evesham and death of Leicester—Settlement of the government—
Death—and character of the king—Miscellaneous transactions of this reign.

MOST sciences, in proportion as they encrease and c HAP. improve, invent methods by which they facilitate their reasonings; and employing general theorems, are enabled to comprehend in a few propositions a great number of inferences and conclusions. History also, being a collection of facts which are multiplying without end, is obliged to adopt such arts of abridgment, to retain the more material events, and to drop all the minute circumstances, which are only interesting during the time, or to

CHAP. the persons engaged in the transactions. This truth is no where more evident than with regard to the reign. upon which we are going to enter. What mortal could have the patience to write or read a long detail of fuch frivolous events as those with which it is filled, or attend to a tedious narrative which would follow, through a feries of fifty-fix years, the caprices and weaknesses of fo mean a prince as Henry? The chief reason, why protestant writers have been so anxious to spread out the incidents of this reign, is in order to expose the rapacity, ambition, and artifices of the court of Rome, and to prove, that the great dignitaries of the catholic church, while they pretended to have nothing in view but the falvation of fouls, had bent all their attention to the acquifition of riches, and were restrained by no sense of justice or of honour, in the pursuit of that great object m. But this conclusion would readily be allowed them, though it were not illustrated by fuch a detail of uninteresting incidents; and follows indeed, by an evident necessity, from the very fituation, in which that church was placed with regard to the rest of Europe. For, besides that ecclesiastical power, as it can always cover its operations under a cloak of fanctity, and attacks men on the fide where they dare not employ their reason, lies less under controul than civil government; besides this general cause, I say, the pope and his courtiers were foreigners to most of the churches which they governed; they could not possibly have any other object than to pillage the provinces for prefent gain; and as they lived at a diffance, they would be little awed by shame or remorfe, in employing every lucrative expedient, which was fuggefted to them. England being one of the most remote provinces attached to the Romish hierarchy, as well as the most prone to superstition, felt severely, during this reign, while its patience was not yet fully exhausted, the influence of these causes; C H A P. and we shall often have occasion to touch cursorily upon such incidents. But we shall not attempt to comprehend every transaction transmitted to us; and till the end of the reign, when the events become more memorable, we shall not always observe an exact chronological order in our narration.

THE earl of Pembroke, who, at the time of John's Settlement of the godeath, was mareschal of England, was by his office at the vernment, head of the armies, and confequently, during a state of civil wars and convulfions, at the head of the government; and it happened fortunately for the young monarch and for the nation, that the power could not have been intrufted into more able and more faithful hands. This nobleman, who had maintained his loyalty unshaken to John during the lowest fortune of that monarch, determined to support the authority of the infant prince; nor was he difmayed at the number and violence of his enemies. Senfible, that Henry, agreeably to the prejudices of the times, would not be deemed a fovereign, till crowned and anointed by a churchman; he immediately carried the young prince 28th Oct. to Gloucester, where the ceremony of coronation was performed, in the presence of Gualo, the legate, and of a few noblemen, by the bishops of Winchester and Bath ". As the concurrence of the papal authority was requifite to support the tottering throne, Henry was obliged to fwear fealty to the pope, and renew that homage, to which his father had already subjected the kingdom o: And in order to enlarge the authority of Pembroke, and to give him a more regular and legal title to it, a general council of the barons was foon after fummoned at Briftol, where that nobleman was chosen protector of 12th Nove the realm.

n M. Paris, p. 200. Hift. Croyf. Cont. p. 474. W. Heming. p. 562.

Trivet, p. 168.

M. Paris, p. 200.

VOL. II.

PEMBROKE,

CHAP. PEMBROKE, that he might reconcile all men to the government of his pupil, made him grant a new charter of liberties, which, though mostly copied from the former concessions extorted from John, contains some alterations, which may be deemed remarkable P. The full privilege of elections in the clergy, granted by the late king, was not confirmed, nor the liberty of going out of the kingdom, without the royal consent: Whence we may conclude, that Pembroke and the barons, jealous of the ecclefiaftical power, both were defirous of renewing the king's claim to iffue a congè d'elire to the monks and chapters, and thought it requifite to put some check to the frequent appeals to Rome. But what may chiefly furprize us is, that the obligation, to which John had fubjected himself, of obtaining the consent of the great council before he levied any aids or scutages upon the nation, was omitted; and this article was even declared hard and fevere, and was expressly left to future deliberation. But we must consider, that, though this limitation may perhaps appear to us the most momentous in the whole charter of John, it was not regarded in that light by the ancient barons, who were more jealous in guarding against particular acts of violence in the crown, than against fuch general impositions, which, unless they were evidently reasonable and necessary, could scarcely, without general confent, be levied upon men, who had arms in their hands, and who could repel any act of oppression, by which they were all immediately affected. We accordingly find, that Henry, in the course of his reign, while he gave frequent occasions for complaint, with regard to his violations of the Great Charter, never attempted, by his mere will, to levy any aids or fcutages; though he was often reduced to great necessities, and was refused supply by his people. So much easier was it for him to transgress the law, when indivi- C H A P. duals alone were affected, than even to exert his acknow- ledged prerogatives, where the interest of the whole body was concerned.

P Rymer, vol. i. p. 1215.

This charter was again confirmed by the king in the enfuing year, with the addition of some articles to prevent the oppressions by sheriffs: And also with an additional charter of forests, a circumstance of great moment in those ages, when hunting was so much the occupation of the nobility, and when the king comprehended so considerable a part of the kingdom within his forests, which he governed by peculiar and arbitrary laws. All the forests, which had been enclosed since the reign of Henry II. were desaforested; and new perambulations were appointed for that purpose: Offences in the forests were declared to be no longer capital; but punishable by fine, imprisonment, and more gentle penalties: And all the proprietors of land recovered the power of cutting and using their own wood at their pleasure.

Thus, these famous charters were brought nearly to the shape, in which they have ever since stood; and they were, during many generations, the peculiar favourites of the English nation, and esteemed the most facred rampart to national liberty and independance. As they secured the rights of all orders of men, they were anxiously defended by all, and became the basis, in a manner, of the English monarchy, and a kind of original contract, which both limited the authority of the king, and ensured the conditional allegiance of his subjects. Though often violated, they were still claimed by the nobility and people; and as no precedents were supposed valid, that infringed them, they rather acquired, than lost authority, from the frequent attempts, made against them in several ages, by regal and arbitrary power.

WHILE Pembroke, by renewing and confirming the Great Charter, gave so much satisfaction and security to

E H A P. the nation in general, he also applied himself successfully to individuals: He wrote letters, in the king's name, to all the malcontent barons; in which he represented to them, that, whatever jealoufy and animofity they might have entertained against the late king, a young prince, the lineal heir of their ancient monarchs, had now fucceeded to the throne, without fucceeding either to theresentments or principles of his predecessor: That the desperate expedient, which they had employed, of calling in a foreign potentate, had, happily for them as well as for the nation, failed of entire success, and it was still in their power, by a speedy return to their duty, to reffore the independance of the kingdom, and to fecure that liberty, for which they fo zealoufly contended: That as all past offences of the barons were now buried in oblivion, they ought, on their part, to forget their complaints against their late sovereign, who, if he had been any wife blameable in his conduct, had left to his fon the falutary warning, to avoid the paths, which had led to fuch fatal extremities: And that having now obtained a charter for their liberties, it was their interest to shew, by their conduct, that this acquisition was not incompatible with their allegiance, and that the rights of king and people, fo far from being hostile and opposite, might mutually support and sustain each other 9.

THESE confiderations, enforced by the character of honour and conftancy, which Pembroke had ever maintained, had a mighty influence on the barons; and most of them began fectetly to negotiate with him, and many of them openly returned to their duty. The diffidence, which Lewis discovered, of their fidelity, forwarded this general propension towards the king; and when the French prince refused the government of the castle of Hertford to Robert Fitz-Walter, who had been so active against the late king, and who claimed that fortress C H A P. as his property, they plainly faw, that the English were excluded from every trust, and that foreigners had engroffed all the confidence and affection of their new fovereign . The excommunication too, denounced by the legate, against all the adherents of Lewis, failed not, in the turn which men's dispositions had taken, to produce a mighty effect upon them; and they were eafily perfuaded to confider a cause as impious, for which they had already entertained an unfurmountable aversion . Though Lewis made a journey to France, and brought over fuccours from that kingdom t, he found, on his return, that his party was still more weakened by the defertion of his English confederates, and that the death of John had, contrary to his expectations, given an incurable wound to his cause. The earls of Salifbury, Arundel, and Warrenne, together with William Marefhal, eldest fon of the protector, had embraced Henry's party; and every English nobleman was plainly watching for an opportunity of returning to his allegiance. Pembroke was fo much strengthened by these accessions, that he ventured to invest Mount-forel; though, upon the approach of the count of Perche with the French army, he defifted from his enterprize, and raifed the fiege ". The count, elated with this fuccess, marched to Lincoln; and being admitted into the town, he began to attack the caffle, which he foon reduced to extremity. The protector fummoned all his forces from every quarter in order to relieve a place of fuch importance; and he appeared fo much superior to the French, that they shut themselves up within the city, and resolved to act upon the defensive w. But the garrison of the castle, having received a strong reinforcement, made a vigorous fally

Rymer, vol. i. p. 215. Brady's App. No 143+

T,

^{*} M. Paris, p. 200. 202. S Ibid. p. 200. M. Weft. p. 277.

⁴ Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 79. M. West. p. 277. u M. Paris,

w Chron. Dunft, vol. i. p. 81.

affaulted them in the fame instant from without, mounted the walls by scalade, and bearing down all resistance, entered the city sword in hand. Lincoln was delivered over to be pillaged; the French army was totally routed; the count de Perche, with only two persons more, was killed, but many of the chief commanders and about 400 knights were made prisoners by the English x. So little blood was shed in this important action, which decided the sate of one of the most powerful kingdoms in Europe; and such wretched soldiers were those ancient barons, who yet were unacquainted with every thing but arms!

PRINCE Lewis was informed of this fatal event, while employed in the fiege of Dover, which was still valiantly defended against him by Hubert de Burgh. He immediately retreated to London, the center and life of his party; and he there received intelligence of a new disafter, which put an end to all his hopes. A French fleet, bringing over a strong reinforcement, had appeared on the coast of Kent; where they were attacked by the English under the command of Philip d'Albiney, and were routed with confiderable lofs. D'Albiney employed a ftratagem against them, which is faid to have contributed to the victory: Having gained the wind of the French, he came down upon them with violence; and throwing in their faces a great quantity of quicklime, which he purposely carried on board, he so blinded them, that they were disabled from defending themfelves y.

AFTER this fecond misfortune of the French, the English barons hastened every where to make peace with the protector, and by an early submission, to prevent those attainders, to which they were exposed on account x M. Paris, p. 204, 205. Chron de Mullr. p. 195.

y M. Paris, p. 206. Ann. Waverl. p. 183. W. Heming. p. 563. Trivet, p. 169. M. West, p. 277. Knyghton, p. 2428.

12,6.

of their rebellion. Lewis, whose cause was now totally C H A P. desperate, began to be anxious for the safety of his person, and was glad, on any honourable conditions, to make his escape from a country, where, he found, every thing was now become hostile to him. He concluded a peace with Pembroke, promised to evacuate the kingdom, and only stipulated in return, an indemnity to his adherents, and a restitution of their honours and fortunes, together with the free and equal enjoyment of those liberties, which had been granted to the rest of the nation z. Thus was hap-General papily ended a civil war, which feemed to be founded on the most incurable hatred and jealoufy, and had threatened the kingdom with the most fatal consequences.

THE precautions, which the king of France used in the conduct of this whole affair, are remarkable. He pretended, that his fon had accepted of the offer from the English barons, without his advice, and contrary to his inclination: The armies fent to England were levied in Lewis's name: When that prince came over to France for aid, his father publicly refused to grant him any affiftance, and would not fo much as admit him to his prefence: Even after Henry's party acquired the afcendant, and Lewis was in danger of falling into the hands of his enemies, it was Blanche of Castile his wife, not the king his father, who raised armies and equipped fleets for his succour 2. All these artifices were employed, not to satisfy the pope; for he had too much penetration to be fo eafily imposed on: Nor yet to deceive the people; for they were too gross even for that purpose: They only served for a colouring to Philip's cause; and in public affairs, men are often better pleafed, that the truth; though known to every body, should be wrapped up under a decent coz Rymer, vol. i. p. 221. M. Paris, p. 207. Chron. Dunft. vol. i. f. 33. M. West. p. 278. Knyghton, p. 2429.

a M. Paris, p. 256. Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 32.

C H A P. ver, than if it were exposed in open day-light to the eyes of all the world.

AFTER the expulsion of the French, the prudence and equity of the protector's subsequent conduct, contributed to cure entirely those wounds, which had been made by intestine discord. He received the rebellious barons into favour; observed strictly the terms of peace, which he had granted them; restored them to their possessions; and endeavoured, by an equal behaviour, to bury all past animofities in perpetual oblivion. The clergy alone, who had adhered to Lewis, were sufferers in this revolution. As they had rebelled against their spiritual sovereign, by difregarding the interdict and excommunication, it was not in Pembroke's power to make any stipulations in their favour; and Gualo, the legate, prepared to take vengeance on them for their disobedience b. Many of them were deposed; many suspended; some banished; and all who escaped punishment, made atonement for their offence, by paying large fums to the legate, who amaffed an immense treasure by this expedient.

Beathof the THE earl of Pembroke did not long furvive the pacifiprotector.

motions.

cation, which had been chiefly owing to his wisdom and valoure; and he was succeeded in the government by Peter des Roches, bishop of Winchester, and Hubert de Burgh, the justiciary. The councils of the latter were chiefly followed; and had he poffeffed equal authority in the kingdom with Pembroke, he feemed to be every way worthy of filling the place of that virtuous Some com- nobleman. But the licentious and powerful barons, who had once broken the reins of subjection to their prince, and had obtained by violence an enlargement of their liberties and independance, could ill be restrained by laws under a minority; and the people, no less than the king, fuffered from their outrages and diforders. They

> b Brady's App. No. 144. Chron. Dung. vol. i. p. 83. P. 21C.

> > retained

retained by force the royal castles, which they had seized C H A P. during the past convulsions, or which had been committed to their custody by the protectord: They usurped the king's demesnes e: They oppressed their vassals: They infested their weaker neighbours: They invited all disorderly people to enter in their retinue, and to live upon their lands: And they gave them protection in all their robberies and extortions.

No one was more infamous for these violent and illegal practices than the earl of Albemarle; who, though he had early returned to his duty, and had been ferviceable in expelling the French, augmented to the utmost the general disorder, and committed outrages in all the counties of the North. In order to reduce him to obedience, Hubert seized an opportunity of getting possesfion of Rockingham castle, which Albemarle had garrifoned with his licentious retinue: But this nobleman, inflead of submitting, entered into a secret confederacy with Fawkes de Breauté, Peter de Mauleon, and other barons, and both fortified the castle of Biham for his defence, and made himself maker by surprize of that of Fotheringay. Pandulf, who was restored to his legateship, was active in suppressing this rebellion; and with the concurrence of eleven bishops, he pronounced the sentence of excommunication against Albemarle and his adherents f: An army was levied: A scutage of ten shillings a knight's fee was imposed on all the military tenants: Albemarle's affociates gradually deferted him: And he himself was obliged at last to sue for mercy. He received a pardon, and was restored to his whole effate.

This impolitic lenity, too frequent in those times, was probably the refult of a fecret combination among the barons, who never could endure to fee the total ruin

d Trivet, p. 174. Dunft. vol. i. p. 102. e Rymer, vol. 1. p. 276.

Breauté, a man whom king John had raised from a low origin, to persevere in the course of violence, to which he had owed his fortune, and to set at naught all law and justice. When thirty-sive verdicts were at one time found against him, on account of his violent expulsion of so many freeholders from their possessions; he came to the court of justice with an armed force, seized the judge who had pronounced the verdicts, and imprisoned him in Bedford castle. He then levied open war against the king; but being subdued, and taken prisoner, his life was granted him: but his estate was confiscated, and he was banished the kingdom s.

JUSTICE was executed with greater feverity against disorders less premeditated, which broke out in London. A frivolous emulation in a match of wreftling, between the Londoners on the one hand, and the inhabitants of Westminster and those of the neighbouring villages on the other, occasioned this commotion. The former rose in a body, and pulled down fome houses belonging to the abbot of Westminster: But this riot, which, considering the tumultuous disposition familiar to that capital, would have been little regarded, feemed to become more ferious, by the fymptoms which then appeared, of the former attachment of the citizens to the French interest. The populace, in the tumult, made use of the cry of war commonly employed by the French troops; Mountjoy, mountjoy, God help us and our lord Lewis. The justiciary made enquiry into the diforder; and finding one Constantine Fitz Arnulf to have been the ringleader, an insolent man, who justified his crime in Hubert's prefence, he proceeded against him by martial law, and ordered him immediately to be hanged, without trial or g Rymer, vol. i. p. 198. M. Paris, p. 221. 224. Ann. Waverl. p. 188. Chron. Dunft, vol. i. p. 141. 146. M. Weft. p. 283.

form of process. He also cut off the feet of some of Con-C H A P. Rantine's accomplices h.

This act of power was complained of as an infringement of the Great Charter: Yet the justiciary, in a patliament, summoned at Oxford, (for the great councils about this time began to receive that appellation) made no scruple to grant in the king's name a renewal and confirmation of that charter. When the affembly made application to the crown for this favour; as a law in those times seemed to lose its validity, if not frequently renewed; William de Briewere, one of the council of regency, was fo bold as to fay openly, that those liberties were extorted by force, and ought not to be observed: But he was reprimanded by the archbishop of Canterbury, and was not countenanced by the king or his chief minifters i. A new confirmation was demanded and granted two years after; and an aid, amounting to a fifteenth of all moveables, was given by the parliament, in return for this indulgence. The king issued writs anew to the sheriffs, enjoining the observance of the charter; but he inferted a remarkable clause in the writs, that those, who payed not the fifteenth, should not for the future be entitled to the benefit of those liberties k.

THE low state, into which the crown was fallen, made it requisite for a good minister to be attentive to the preservation of the royal prerogatives, as well as to the security of public liberty. Hubert applied to the pope, who had always great authority in the kingdom, and was now considered as its superior lord; and desired him to issue a bull, declaring the king to be of full age, and entitled to exercise in person all the acts of royalty so In consequence of this declaration, the justiciary resigned into Henry's hands the two important fortresses of the h M. Paris, p. 217, 218. 259. Ann. Waverl. p. 187. Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 129.

i M. West. p. 232.

k Clause 9. H. 3. m. 9. and m. 6. d.

l M. Paris, p. 220.

1222a

CHAP. Tower and Dover castle, which had been entrusted to his custody; and he required the other barons to imitate his example. They refused compliance: The earls of Chefter and Albemarle, John Constable of Chefter, John de Lacy, Brian de l'Isle, and William de Cantel, with fome others, even formed a conspiracy to surprize London, and met in arms at Waltham with that intention: But finding the king prepared for defence, they defisted from their enterprize. When summoned to court, in order to answer for their conduct, they scrupled not to appear, and to confess the design: But they told the king, that they had no bad intentions against his person, but only against Hubert de Burgh, whom they were determined to remove from his office m. They appeared too formidable to be chaffifed; and they were fo little difcouraged by the failure of their first enterprize, that they again met in arms at Leicester, in order to seize the king, who then refided at Northampton: But Henry, informed of their purpose, took care to be so well armed and attended, that the barons found it dangerous to make the attempt; and they fat down and kept Christmas in his neighbourhood ". The archbishop and the prelates, finding every thing tend towards a civil war, interposed with their authority, and threatened the barons with the fentence of excommunication, if they perfifted in detaining the king's castles. This menace at last prevailed: Most of the fortreffes were furrendered; though the barons complained, that Hubert's castles were soon after restored to him, while the king still kept theirs in his own custody. There are said to have been 1115 castles at that time in England 9.

IT must be acknowledged, that the influence of the prelates and the clergy was often of great fervice to the public. Though the religion of that age can merit no C H A P. better name than that of superstition, it served to unite together a body of men who had great fway over the people, and who kept the community from falling to pieces, by the factions and independant power of the nobles. And what was of great importance; it threw a mighty authority into the hands of men, who by their profession were averse to arms and violence; who tempered by their mediation the general disposition towards military enterprizes; and who still maintained, even amidst the shock of arms, those secret links, without which it is impossible for human fociety to subsist.

m Chron, Dunft. vol. i. p. 137. n M. Paris, p. 221. Chron. Dunft, vol. i. p. 138. e Coke's Commen', on Magna Charta, chap. 17.

NOTWITHSTANDING these intestine commotions in England, and the precarious authority of the crown. Henry was obliged to carry on war in France; and he employed to that purpose the fifteenth which had been granted him by parliament. Lewis VIII. who had fucceeded to his father Philip, instead of complying with Henry's claim, who demanded the restitution of Normandy and the other provinces wrested from England, made an irruption into Poictou, took Rochelle pafter a long fiege, and feemed determined to expel the English from the few provinces which still remained to them. Henry fent over his uncle, the earl of Salisbury; together with his brother prince Richard, to whom he had granted the earldom of Cornwal, which had escheated to the crown. Salisbury stopped the progress of Lewis's arms, and retained the Poictevin and Gascon vassals in their allegiance: But no military action of any moment was performed on either fide. The earl of Cornwal, after two years' flay in Guienne, returned to England.

THIS prince was nowife turbulent or factious in his 1227. disposition: His ruling passion was to amass money, in

? Rymer, vol. i. p. 269. Trivet, p. 179.

which

C H A P. which he succeeded so well as to become the richest subject in Christendom: Yet his attention to gain threw him fometimes into acts of violence, and gave disturbance to the government. There was a manor, which had formerly belonged to the earldom of Cornwal, but had been granted to Waleran de Ties, before Richard had been invested with that dignity, and while the earldom remained in the crown. Richard claimed this manor, and expelled the proprietor by force: Waleran complained: The king ordered his brother to do justice to the man, and restore him to his rights: The earl said, that he would not fubmit to these orders, till the cause should be decided against him by the judgment of his peers: Henry replied, that it was first necessary to re-instate Waleran in possession, before the cause could be tried; and he re-iterated his orders to the earl q. We may judge of the state of the government, when this affair had nearly produced a civil war. The earl of Cornwal, finding Henry peremptory in his commands, affociated himself with the young earl of Pembroke, who had married his fifter, and who was displeased on account of the king's requiring him to deliver up fome royal caftles which were in his custody. These two malcontents took into the confederacy the earls of Chester, Warenne, Glocester, Hereford, Warwic, and Ferrers, who were all difgusted on a like account . They affembled an army, which the king had not the power or courage to refift; and he was obliged to give his brother fatisfaction, by grants of much greater importance than the manor, which had been the first ground of the quarrel s.

THE character of the king, as he grew to man's estate, became every day better known; and he was found in every respect unqualified for maintaining a proper fway among those turbulent barons, whom the feudal constitution subjected to his authority. Gentle, C H A P. humane, and merciful even to a fault, he feems to have been steady in no other circumstance of his character; but to have received every impression from those who furrounded him, and whom he loved, for the time, with the most imprudent and most unreserved affection. Without activity or vigour, he was unfit to conduct war: without policy or art, he was ill-fitted to maintain peace; His refentments, though hafty and violent, were not dreaded, while he was found to drop them with fuch facility; his friendships were little valued, because they were neither derived from choice, nor maintained with constancy. A proper pageant of state in a regular monarchy, where his ministers could have conducted all affairs in his name and by his authority; but too feeble in those disorderly times to sway a scepter, whose weight depended entirely on the firmness and dexterity of the hand which held it.

4 M. Paris, p. 233.

r Ibid.

s Ibid.

THE ablest and most virtuous minister that Henry ever Hobert de possessed, was Hubert de Burgh t; a man who had been Burgh difsteady to the crown in the most difficult and dangerous times, and who yet shewed no disposition, in the height of his power, to enflave or oppress the people. The only exceptionable part of his conduct is that which is mentioned by Matthew Paris ", if the fact be really true, and proceeded from Hubert's advice, namely, the recalling publicly and the annulling of the charter of forests, a concession so reasonable in itself, and so passionately claimed both by the nobility and people: But it must be confessed, that this measure is so unlikely, both from the circumstances of the times and character of the minister, that there is reason to doubt of its reality, especially as it is mentioned by no other historian. Hut Ypod. Neuftriæ, p. 464. u P. 232. M. Weft. p. 216. ascribes this counsel to Peter Bishop of Winchester.

CHAP. bert, while he enjoyed his authority, had an entire afcend? ant over Henry, and was loaded with honours and favours beyond any other subject. Besides acquiring the pro-1327. perty of many caftles and manors, he married the eldeft fifter of the king of Scots, was created earl of Kent, and by an unufual concession, was made chief justiciary of 1231. England for life: Yet Henry, in a sudden caprice, threw off this faithful minister, and exposed him to the violent perfecutions of his enemies. Among other frivolous crimes objected to him, he was accused of gaining the king's affections by enchantment, and of purloining from the royal treafury a gem, which had the virtue to render the wearer invulnerable, and of fending this valuable curiofity to the prince of Wales w. The nobility, who hated Hubert on account of his zeal in refuming the rights and poffessions of the crown, no sooner faw the opportunity favourable, than they inflamed the king's animosity against him, and pushed him to seek the total ruin of his minister. Hubert took sanctuary in a church: The king ordered him to be dragged from thence: He recalled those orders: He afterwards renewed them: He was obliged by the clergy to restore him to the sanctuary: He constrained him foon after to surrender himself prifoner, and he confined him in the castle of the Devises. Hubert made his escape, was expelled the kingdom, was again received into favour, recovered a great share of the king's confidence, but never showed any inclination to reinstate himself in power and authority x.

Bishop of Winchester minister.

THE man, who succeeded him in the government of the king and kingdom, was Peter, bishop of Winchester, a Poictevin by birth, who had been raised by the late king, and who was no less distinguished by his arbitrary

W. M. Paris, p. 259. X Ibid. p. 259, 260, 261. 266. Chron. T. Wykes, p. 41, 42. Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 220, 221. M. West. p. 291, 301.

principles

12310

principles and violent conduct, than by his courage and C H A P. abilities. This prelate had been left by king John justiciary and regent of the kingdom during an expedition which that prince made into France; and his illegal administration was one chief cause of that great combination among the barons, which finally extorted from the crown the charter of liberties, and laid the foundations of the English constitution. Henry, though incapable, from his character, of pursuing the same violent maxims, which had governed his father, had imbibed the fame arbitrary principles; and in profecution of Peter's advice, he invited over a great number of Poictevins and other foreigners, who, he believed, could more fafely be trufted than the English, and who feemed useful to counterbalance the great and independant power of the nobility r. Every office and command was bestowed on these ftrangers; they exhausted the revenues of the crown, already too much impoverished 2; they invaded the rights of the people; and their infolence, still more provoking than their power, drew on them the hatred and envy of all orders of men in the kingdom a.

THE barons formed a combination against this odious ministry, and withdrew from parliament; on pretence of the danger, to which they were exposed from the machinations of the Poictevins. When again fummoned to attend, they gave for answer, that the king should dismiss his foreigners: Otherwise they would drive both him and them out of the kingdom, and put the crown on another head, more worthy to wear it b: Such was the style they used to their sovereign! They at last came to parliament, but so well attended, that they seemed in a condition to prescribe laws to the king and ministry. Peter des Roches, however, had in the interval found means of

y M. Paris, p. 263.

VOL. II.

Z Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 151.

fowing

12330

a M. Paris, p. 258.

b Ibid. p. 265.

M

CHAP. fowing diffention among them, and of bringing over to his party the earl of Cornwal, as well as the earls of Lincoln and Chefter, The confederates were disconcerted in their measures: Richard, earl Marischal, who had fucceeded to that dignity on the death of his brother, William, was chased into Wales; he thence withdrew into Ireland; where he was treacherously murdered by the contrivance of the bishop of Winchester c. The estates of the more obnoxious barons were confiscated, without legal fentence or trial by their peers d; and were bestowed with a profuse liberality on the Poictevins. Peter even carried his infolence fo far as to declare publickly, that the barons of England must not pretend to put themfelves on the fame foot with those of France, or assume the fame liberties and privileges: The monarch in the former country had a more absolute power than in the latter. It had been more justifiable for him to have said, that men, fo unwilling to submit to the authority of laws, could with the worfe grace claim any shelter or protection from them.

WHEN the king at any time was checked in his illegal practices, and when the authority of the Great Charter was objected to him, he was wont to reply; "Why should I observe this charter, which is neglected by all my grandees, both prelates and nobility?" It was very reasonably said to him: "You ought, fir, to set them the example "."

So violent a ministry, as that of the bishop of Winchester, could not be of long duration; but its fall proceeded at last from the influence of the church, not from the efforts of the nobles. Edmond, the primate, came to court, attended by many of the other prelates; and represented to the king the pernicious measures embraced by Peter des Roches, the discontents of his people, e Chron, Dunft, vol. i. p. 219. d M. Paris, p. 265. e Ibid. p. 609.

the ruin of his affairs; and after requiring the dismission C H A P of the minister and his affociates, threatened him with excommunication, in case of his refusal. Henry, who knew that an excommunication, fo agreeable to the fense of the people, could not fail of producing the most dangerous effects, was obliged to submit: Foreigners were banished: The natives were restored to their place in council f: The primate, who was a man of prudence, and who took care to execute the laws and observe the charter of liberties, bore the chief sway in the government.

But the English in vain flattered themselves that they 1236. should be long free from the dominion of foreigners. ary. The king, having married Eleanor, daughter of the count of Provence s, was furrounded by a great number of strangers from that country, whom he caressed with King's perthe fondest affection, and enriched by an imprudent gene-reigners. rofity h. The bishop of Valence, a prelate of the house of Savoy, and maternal uncle to the queen, was his chief minister, and employed every art to amass wealth for himself and his relations. Peter of Savoy, a brother of the same family, was invested in the honour of Richmond, and received the rich wardship of earl Warrenne: Boniface of Savoy was promoted to the see of Canterbury: Many young ladies were invited over from Provence, and married to the chief noblemen in England, who were the king's wards i: And as the fource of Henry's bounty began to fail, his Savoyard ministry applied to Rome, and obtained a bull; permitting him to refume all past grants; absolving him from the oath, which he had taken to maintain them; even enjoining him to make fuch a refumption, and representing those

g Rymer, vol. i. p. 448. M. Paris, f M. Paris, p. 271, 272. h M. Paris, p. 236. 301. 305. 316. 541. M. West. i M. Paris, p. 484. M. West. p. 338.

M 2

p. 286.

P. 302. 304.

grants

C H A P. grants as invalid, on account of the prejudice which enfued from them to the Roman pontiff, in whom the fuperiority of the kingdom was vested k. The opposition. 1236. made to the intended refumption, prevented it from taking place; but the nation faw the indignities, to which the king was willing to fubmit, in order to gratify the avidity of his foreign favourites. About the fame time, he published in England the sentence of excommunication, pronounced against the emperor Frederic, his brother-inlaw 1; and faid in excuse, that, being the pope's vasfal, he was obliged by his allegiance to obey all the commands of his holinefs. In this weak reign, when any neighbouring potentate infulted the king's dominions. instead of taking revenge for the injury, he complained to the pope as his superior lord, and begged him to give protection to his vassal m.

Grievances.

THE refentment of the English barons rose high at the preference given to foreigners; but no remonstrance or complaint could ever prevail on the king to abandon them, or even to moderate his attachment towards them. After the Provençals and Savoyards might have been supposed pretty well fatiated with the dignities and riches which they had acquired, a new fet of hungry foreigners were invited over, and shared among them those favours, which the king ought in policy to have conferred on the English nobility, by whom his government could have been supported and defended. His mother, Isabella, who had been unjustly taken by the late king from the count de la Marche, to whom she was betrothed, was no fooner mistress of herself by the death of her husband, than she married that nobleman "; and she had born him four fons, Guy, William, Geoffrey, and Aymer, whom the fent over to England, in order to pay a vifit to their k M. Paris, p. 295 301. 1 Rymer, vol. i. p. 383. m Chron.

Dunst, vol. i. p. 150. a Trivet, p. 174.

brother,

$2 -7.

brother. The good-natured and affectionate disposition C H A P. of Henry was moved at the fight of fuch near relations; and he confidered neither his own circumstances, nor the inclinations of his people, in the honours and riches which he conferred upon them °. Complaints rose as high against the credit of the Gascon as ever they had done against that of the Poictevin and of the Savoyard favourites; and to a nation prejudiced against them, all their measures appeared exceptionable and criminal. Violations of the Great Charter were frequently mentioned: and it is indeed more than probable, that foreigners, ignorant of the laws, and relying on the boundless affections of a weak prince, would, in an age, when a regular administration was not any where known, pay more attention to their present interest than to the liberties of the people. It is reported, that the Poictevins and other strangers, when the laws were at any time appealed to, in opposition to their oppressions, scrupled not to reply, What did the English laws signify to them? They minded them not. And as words are often more offenfive than actions, this open contempt of the English tended much to aggravate the general discontent, and made every act of violence, committed by the foreigners, appear not only an injury, but an affront to them P.

I RECKON not among the violations of the Great Charter, some arbitrary exertions of prerogative, to which Henry's necessities pushed him, and which, without producing any discontent, were uniformly continued by all his fucceffors, till the last century. As the parliament often refused him supplies, and that in a manner somewhat rude and indecent 9, he obliged his opulent subjects, particularly the citizens of London, to grant him loans of money; and it is natural to imagine, that the fame

o M. Paris, p. 491. M. West. p. 338. Knyghton, p. 2436.

P M. Paris, p. 566. 666. Ann. Waverl p. 214, Chron, Dunft, vol. i. 9 M. Paris, p. 301. P. 335.

C H A P. want of occonomy, which reduced him to the necessity of borrowing, would prevent him from being very punctual in the repayment r. He demanded benevolences or pre-1247. tended voluntary contributions from his nobility and prelates s. He was the first king of England since the conquest, that could fairly be said to lie under the restraint of law; and he was also the first that practifed the dispensing power, and employed the clause of Non-obstante in his grants and patents. When objections were made to this novelty, he replied, that the pope exercised that authority; and why might not he imitate the example? But the abuse, which the pope made of his dispensing power, in violating the canons of general councils, in invading the privileges and customs of all particular churches, and in usurping on the rights of patrons, was more likely to excite the jealoufy of the people, than to reconcile them to a similar practice in their civil government. Roger de Thurkefby, one of the king's justices, was so displeased with the precedent, that he exclaimed, Alas! what times are we fallen into? Behold, the civil court is corrupted in imitation of the ecclefiastical, and the river is poisoned from that fountain.

THE king's partiality and profuse bounty to his foreign relations, and to their friends and favourites, would have appeared more tolerable to the English, had any thing been done mean-while for the honour of the nation, or had Henry's enterprizes in foreign countries, been attended with any success or glory to himself or to the public: At least, such military talents in the king would have served to keep his barons in awe, and have given weight and authority to his government. But though he declared war against Lewis IX. in 1242, and made an expedition into Guienne, upon the invitation of his father-in-law, the count de la Marche, who promised to join him with all his forces; he was unfuccessful in his at-C H A P. tempts against that great monarch, was worsted at Taille- L bourg, was deferted by his allies, lost what remained to him of Poictou, and was obliged to return, with loss of honour, into England t. The Gafcon nobility were attached to the English government; because the distance of their fovereign allowed them to remain in a state of almost total independance: And they claimed, some time after, Henry's protection against an invasion, which the king of Castile made upon that territory. Henry returned into Guienne, and was more fuccessful in this expedition; but he thereby involved himself and his nobility in an enormous debt, which both encreased their discontents, and exposed him to greater danger from their enterprizes ".

1253-

WANT of economy and an ill-judged liberality were Henry's great defects; and his debts, even before this expedition, had become fo troublesome, that he fold all his plate and jewels, in order to discharge them. When this expedient was first proposed to him, he asked, where he should find purchasers? It was replied, the citizens of London. On my word, faid he, if the treasury of Augustus were brought to fale, the citizens are able to be the purchasers: These clowns, who assume to themselves the name of barons, abound in every thing, while we are reduced to necessities w. And he was thenceforth observed to be more forward and greedy in his exactions upon the citizens x.

But the grievances, which the English during this Ecclesiatireign had reason to complain of in the civil government, ances. feem to have been still less burthensome than those which they fuffered from the usurpations and exactions of the court of Rome. On the death of Langton in 1228, the monks of Christ-church elected Walter de Hemesham, t M. Paris, p. 393, 394. 398, 399. 405. W. Heming. p. 574. Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 153. u M. Paris, p. 614. w M. Paris, x M. Paris, p. 501. 507. 518. 578. 606. 625. 648. p. 501.

M 4

one

CHAP. one of their own body, for his successor: But as Henry refused to confirm the election, the pope, at his desire, an-1253. nulled it y; and immediately appointed Richard, chancellor of Lincoln, for archbishop, without waiting for a new election. On the death of Richard in 1231, the monks elected Ralph de Neville bishop of Chichester; and though Henry was much pleased with the election, the pope, who thought that prelate too much attached to the crown, assumed the power of annulling his election z. He rejected two clergymen more, whom the monks had fuccessively chosen; and he at last told them, that, if they would elect Edmond, treasurer of the church of Salisbury, he would confirm their choice; and his nomination was complied with. The pope had the prudence to appoint both times very worthy primates; but men could not forbear observing his intention of thus drawing gradually to himself the right of bestowing that important dignity.

> THE avarice, however, more than the ambition of the see of Rome, seems to have been in this age the ground of general complaint. The papal ministers, finding a vast stock of power amassed by their predecessors, were desirous of turning it to immediate profit, which they enjoyed at home, rather than of enlarging their authority in distant countries, where they never intended to reside. Every thing was become venal in the Romish tribunals; simony was openly practised; no favours and even no justice could be obtained without a bribe; the highest bidder was sure to have the preference, without regard either to the merits of the person or of the cause; and besides the usual perversions of right in the decision of controversies, the pope openly assumed an absolute and uncontroled authority of setting aside, by the plenitude of his apostolic power, all particular rules and all privileges of patrons, churches, and convents.

On pretence of remedying these abuses, pope Honorius, C H A P. in 1226, complaining of the poverty of his fee as the fource of all grievances, demanded from every cathedral two of the best prebends, and from every convent two monks' portions, to be fet apart as a perpetual and fettled revenue of the papal crown: But all men being fensible, that the revenue would continue for ever, the abuses immediately return, his demand was unanimously rejected. About three years after, the pope demanded and obtained the tenth of all ecclefiastical revenues, which he levied in a very oppressive manner; requiring payment before the clergy had drawn their rents or tythes, and fending about usurers, who advanced them the money at exorbitant interest. In the year 1240, Otho, the legate, having in vain attempted the clergy in a body, obtained feparately, by intrigues and menaces, large fums from the prelates and convents, and on his departure is faid to have carried more money out of the kingdom than he left in it. This experiment was renewed four years after with fuccess by Martin the nuncio, who brought from Rome powers of suspending and excommunicating all clergymen, that refused to comply with his demands. The king, who relied on the pope for the support of his tottering authority, never failed to countenance those exactions.

MEANWHILE, all the chief benefices of the kingdom were conferred on Italians; great numbers of that nation were fent over at one time to be provided for; nonrefidence and pluralities were carried to an enormous height; Mansel, the king's chaplain, is computed to have held at once feven hundred ecclefiaftical livings; and the abuses became so evident as to be palpable to the blindness of superstition itself. The people, entering into affociations, rose against the Italian clergy; pillaged their barns; wasted their lands; insulted the persons of such of them as they found in the kingdom a; and when the juf-

a Rymer, vol. i. p. 323. M. Paris, p. 255. 257.

C H A P. tices made enquiry into the authors of this diforder, the guilt was found to involve fo many, and those of such high rank, that it passed unpunished. At last, when Innocent IV. in 1245, called a general council at Lyons, in order to excommunicate the emperor Frederic, the king and nobility fent over agents to complain before the council, of the rapacity of the Romish church. They represented, among many other grievances, that the benefices of the Italian clergy in England had been estimated. and were found to amount to 60,000 marks b a year, a fum which exceeded the annual revenue of the crown itfelf c. They obtained only an evafive answer from the pope; but as mention had been made before the council, of the feudal subjection of England to the see of Rome, the English agents, at whose head was Roger Bigod earl of Norfolk, exclaimed against the pretension, and infifted, that king John had no right, without the confent of his barons, to fubject the kingdom to so ignominious a servitude d. The popes indeed, afraid of carrying matters too far against England, seem thenceforth to have little infifted on that pretenfion.

This check, received at the council of Lyons, was not able to stop the court of Rome in its rapacity: Innocent exacted the revenues of all vacant benefices, the twentieth of all ecclefiaftical revenues without exception; the third of fuch as exceeded a hundred marks a year; the half of fuch as were possessed by non-residents . He claimed the goods of all intestate clergymen ; he pretended a title to inherit all money gotten by usury; he le-

b Innocent's bull in Rymer, vol. i. p. 471, fays only 50,000 marks a year.

c M. Paris, p. 451. The customs were part of Henry's revenue, and amounted to 6000 pounds a year: They were at first small sums paid by the merchants for the use of the king's warehouses, measures, weights, &c. See Gilbert's history of the Exch. p. 214.

d M. Paris, p. 460. e M. Paris, p. 480. Ann. Burt. p. 305. f M. Paris, p. 474. 373.

vied benevolences upon the people; and when the CHAP. king, contrary to his usual practice, prohibited these exactions, he threatened to pronounce against him the fame censures, which he had emitted against the emperor Frederic s.

1255.

Bur the most oppressive expedient, employed by the pope, was the embarking of Henry in a project for the conquest of Naples, or Sicily on this fide the Fare, as it was called; an enterprize, which threw much dishonour on the king, and involved him, during fome years, in great trouble and expence. The Romish church, taking advantage of favourable incidents, had reduced the kingdom of Sicily to the same state of feudal vassalage, which the pretended to extend over England, and which, by reason of the distance, as well as high spirit of this latter kingdom, she was not able to maintain. After the death of the emperor, Frederic II. the fuccession of Sicily devolved to Conradine, grandfon of that monarch; and Mainfroy, his natural fon, under pretence of governing the kingdom during the minority of the prince, had formed a scheme of establishing his own anthority. Pope Innocent, who had carried on violent war against the emperor, Frederic, and had endeavoured to disposses him of his Italian dominions, still continued hostilities against his grandfon; but being disappointed in all his schemes by the activity and artifices of Mainfroy, he found, that his own force alone was not fufficient to bring to a happy iffue fo great an enterprize. He pretended to dispose of the Sicilian crown, both as superior lord of that particular kingdom, and as vicar of Christ, to whom all kingdoms of the earth were subjected; and he made a tender of it to Richard earl of Cornwal, whose immense riches, he flattered himself, would be able to support the military operations

e H A P. against Mainfroy. As Richard had the prudence to refuse the present h, he applied to the king, whose levity and thoughtless disposition gave Innocent more hopes of succefs; and he offered him the crown of Sicily for his fecond fon, Edmond i. Henry, allured by fo magnificent a present, without reflecting on the consequences, without confulting either with his brother or the parliament. accepted of the infidious propofal; and gave the pope unlimited credit to expend whatever fums he thought necessary for compleating the conquest of Sicily. Innocent, who was engaged by his own interests to wage war with Mainfroy, was glad to carry on his enterprizes at the expence of his ally: Alexander IV. who succeeded him in the papal throne, continued the fame policy: And Henry was furprized to find himself on a sudden involved in an immense debt, which he had never been consulted in contracting. The fum already amounted to 135,541 marks beside interest k; and he had the prospect, if he answered this demand, of being soon loaded with more exorbitant expences; if he refused it, of both incurring the pope's displeasure, and losing the crown of Sicily, which he hoped foon to have the glory of fixing on the head of his fon.

HE applied to the parliament for fupply; and that he might be fure not to meet with opposition, he sent no writs to the more refractory barons: But even those who were summoned, sensible of the ridiculous cheat, imposed by the pope, determined not to lavish their money on such chimerical projects; and making a pretext of the absence of their brethren, they refused to take the king's demands into confideration 1. In this extremity the clergy were his only resource; and as both their temporal and spiri-

h M. Paris, p. 650. i Rymer, vol. i. p. 502. 512. 530. M. Paris, P. 599. 613. k Rymer, vol. i. p. 587. Chron. Dunft. vol. i. P. 319. 1 M. Paris, p. 614.

able to defend themselves against this united authority.

THE pope published a crusade for the conquest of Sicily; and required every one, who had taken the cross against the Infidels, or had vowed to advance money for that service, to support the war against Mainsroy, a more terrible enemy, as he pretended, to the Christian faith than any Saracen m. He levied a tenth on all ecclesiastical benefices in England for three years; and gave orders to excommunicate all bishops, who made not punctual payment. He granted to the king the goods of intestate clergymen; the revenues of vacant benefices; the revenues of all non-residents m. But these taxations, being levied by some rule, were deemed less grievous, than another imposition, which arose from the suggestion of the bishop of Heresord, and which might have opened the door to endless and intolerable abuses.

This prelate, who refided at the court of Rome by a deputation from the English church, drew bills of different values, but amounting on the whole to 150,540 marks, on all the bishops and abbots of the kingdom; and granted these bills to Italian merchants, who, it was pretended, had advanced money for the service of the war against Mainsroy. As there was no likelihood of the English prelates' submitting, without compulsion, to such an extraordinary demand, Rustand, the legate, was charged with the commission of employing authority to that purpose; and he summoned an assembly of the bishops and abbots, whom he acquainted with the pleasure of the pope and of the king. Great were the surprize and indignation of the assembly: The bishop of Worcester exclaimed, that he would lose his life rather

o M. Paris, p. 612. 628. Chron. T. Wykes, p. 54.

m Rymer, vol. i. p. 547, 548, &c. n Rymer, vol. i. p. 597, 598.

C H A P. than comply: The bishop of London said, that the pope and king were more powerful than he; but if his mitre were taken off his head, he would clap on a helmet in its place P. The legate was no less violent on the other hand; and he told the affembly, in plain terms, that all ecclefiaftical benefices were the property of the pope, and he might dispose of them, either in whole or in part, as he faw proper q. In the end, the bishops and abbots, being threatened with excommunication, which made all their revenues fall into the king's hands, were obliged to fubmit to the exaction: And the only mitigation, which the legate allowed them, was, that the tenths, already granted, should be accepted as a partial payment of the bills. But the money was still insufficient for the pope's purpose: The conquest of Sicily was as remote as ever: The demands which came from Rome were endless: Pope Alexander became fo urgent a creditor, that he fent over a legate to England; threatening the kingdom with an interdict, and the king with excommunication, if the arrears, which he pretended to be due to him, were not inflantly remitted r: And at last, Henry, sensible of the cheat, began to think of breaking off the agreement, and of refigning into the pope's hands that crown, which, it was not intended by Alexander, that he or his family fhould ever enjoy s.

Earl of Cornwal elected king of the Romans.

THE earl of Cornwal had now reason to value himself on his forefight, in refufing the fraudulent bargain with Rome, and in preferring the folid honours of an opulent and powerful prince of the blood of England, to the empty and precarious glory of a foreign dignity. But he had not always firmness sufficient to adhere to this refolution: His vanity and ambition prevailed at last over his prudence and his avarice; and he was engaged in an

P M. Paris, p. 614. 9 M. Paris, p. 619. vol. i. p. 624. M. Paris, p. 648. S Rymer, vol. i. p. 630.

12550

enterprize no less expensive and vexatious than that of his C H A P. brother, and not attended with much greater probability of fuccess. The immense opulence of Richard having made the German princes cast their eye on him as a candidate for the empire; he was tempted to expend vaft fums of money on his election, and he fucceeded fo far as to be chosen king of the Romans, which seemed to render his fuccession infallible to the imperial throne. He went over to Germany, and carried out of the kingdom no less a sum than seven hundred thousand marks, if we may credit the account given by fome ancient authors s, which is probably much exaggerated . His money, while it lasted, procured him friends and partizans: But it was foon drained from him by the avidity of the German princes; and, having no perfonal or family connexions in that country, and no folid foundation of power, he found at last, that he had lavished away the frugality of a whole life, in order to procure a fplendid title, and that his absence from England, joined to the weakness of his brother's government, gave reins to the factious and turbulent dispositions of the English barons, and involved his own country and family in great calamities.

THE fuccessful revolt of the nobility from king John, Discontents and their imposing on him and his successors limitations of of the batheir royal power, had made them feel their own weight s M. Paris, p. 638. The same author, a few pages before, makes Richard's treasures amount to little more than half the sum, p. 634. The king's diffipations and expences, throughout his whole reign, according to the fame author, had amounted only to about 940,000 marks, p. 638.

t The fums mentioned by ancient authors, who were almost all monks, are often improbable, and never confistent. But we know from an infallible authority, the public remonstrance to the council of Lyons, that the king's revenues were below 60,000 marks a year : His brother therefore could never have been mafter of 700,000 marks; especially as he did not sell his estates in England, as we learn from the fame author: And we hear afterwards of his ordering all his woods to be cut, in order to fatisfy the rapacity of the German princes: His fon succeeded to the earldom of Cornwal and his other revenues,

and

CHAP, and importance, had fet a dangerous precedent of refiftance, and being followed by a long minority, had impoverished, as well as weakened that crown, which they were at last induced, from the fear of worse consequences, to re-place on the head of young Henry. In the king's situation, either great abilities and vigour were requisite to overawe the barons, or great caution and referve to give them no pretence for complaints; and it must be confessed, that this prince was possessed of neither of these talents. He had not prudence to chuse right measures; he wanted even that conftancy, which fometimes gives weight to wrong ones; he was entirely devoted to his favourites, who were always foreigners; he lavished on them without discretion his diminished revenue; and finding, that his barons indulged their disposition towards tyranny, and observed not to their own vassals the same rules, which they had imposed on the crown, he was apt, in his administration, to neglect all the salutary articles of the Great Charter; which he remarked to be fo little regarded by his nobility. This conduct had extremely lessened his authority in the kingdom; had multiplied complaints against him; and had frequently exposed him to affronts, and even to dangerous attempts upon his prerogative. In the year 1244, when he defired a fupply from parliament, the barons, complaining of the frequent breaches of the Great Charter, and of the many fruitless applications which they had formerly made for the redress of this and other grievances, demanded in return, that he should give them the nomination of the great justiciary and of the chancellor, to whose hands chiefly the administration of justice was committed: And, if we may credit the historian ", they had formed the plan of other limitations, as well as of affociations to maintain them, which would have reduced the king to be an absolute cypher, and have held the crown in perpetual pupillage C H A P. and dependance. The king, to fatisfy them, would agree to nothing but a renewal of the charter, and a general permission to excommunicate all the violaters of it: And he received no fupply, except a fcutage of twenty shillings on each knight's fee for the marriage of his eldeft daughter to the king of Scotland; a burthen, which was expressly annexed to their feudal tenures.

Four years after, in a full parliament, when Henry demanded a new fupply, he was openly reproached with the breach of his word, and the frequent violations of the charter. He was asked, whether he did not blush to defire any aid from his people, whom he profesfedly hated and despised, to whom on all occasions he preferred aliens and foreigners, and who groaned under the oppreffions, which he either permitted or exercised over them. He was told, that, besides disparaging his nobility by forcing them to contract unequal and mean marriages with strangers, no rank of men was fo low as to escape vexations from him or his ministers; that even the victuals confumed in his household, the clothes which himself and his fervants wore, still more the wine which they used, were all taken by violence from the lawful owners, and no compensation was ever made them for the injury; that foreign merchants, to the great prejudice and infamy of the kingdom, shunned the English harbours, as if they were possessed by pirates, and the commerce with all nations was thus cut off by these acts of violence; that loss was added to loss, and injury to injury, while the merchants, who had been despoiled of their goods, were also obliged to carry them at their own charge to whatever place the king was pleafed to appoint them; that even the poor fishermen on the coast could not escape his oppressions and those of his courtiers; and finding that they had not full liberty to dispose of their commo-VOL. II.

C H A P. dities in the English market, were frequently constrained to carry them to foreign ports, and to hazard all the perils 1255. of the ocean, rather than those which awaited them from his oppressive emissaries; and that his very religion was a ground of complaint to his subjects, while they observed, that the waxen tapers and splendid silks, employed in so many useful processions, were the spoils which he had forcibly ravished from the true owners w. Throughout this remonstrance, in which the complaints, derived from an abuse of the ancient right of purveyance, may be supposed to be somewhat exaggerated, there appears a strange mixture of regal tyranny in the practices which gave rife to it, and of aristocratical liberty or rather licentiousness in the expressions employed by the parliament. But a mixture of this kind is observable in all the ancient feudal governments; and both of them proved equally hurtful to the people.

As the king, in answer to their remonstrance, gave the parliament only good words and fair promises, attended with the most humble submissions, which they had often found deceitful, he obtained at that time no supply; and therefore, in the year 1253, when he found himself again under the necessity of applying to parliament, he had provided a new pretence, which he deemed infallible, and taking the vow of a Crusade, he demanded their assistance in that pious enterprize *. The parliament, however, for some time hesitated to comply; and the ecclesiassical order sent a deputation consisting of sour prelates, the primate, and the bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Carlisse, in order to remonstrate with him on his frequent violations of their privileges, the oppressions with which he had loaded them and all his subjects *, and the unca-

w M. Paris, p. 498. See farther, p. 578. M. West. p. 348.

x M. Paris, p. 518. 558. 568. Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 293.

y M. Paris, p. 568.

nonical and forced elections, which were made to vacant C H A P. dignities. "It is true," replied the king, "I have been somewhat faulty in this particular: I obtruded 1255. vou my lord of Canterbury, upon your fee: I was obliged to employ both entreaties and menaces, my 66 lord of Winchester, to have you elected: My proceed-66 ings, I confess, were very irregular, my lords of Sa-66 lifbury and Carlifle, when I raifed you from the lowest " stations to your present dignities: I am determined 66 henceforth to correct these abuses; and it will also become you, in order to make a thorough reformation. to refign your present benefices; and try to enter again " in a more regular and canonical manner z." The bishops, surprized at these unexpected sarcasms, replied, that the question was not at present how to correct past errors, but to avoid them for the future. The king promifed redress both of ecclesiastical and civil grievances; and the parliament in return agreed to grant him a fupply, a tenth of the ecclefiastical benefices, and a scutage of three marks on each knight's fee: But as they had experienced his frequent breach of promise, they required, that he should ratify the Great Charter in a manner still more authentic and more folemn than any which he had hitherto employed. All the prelates and abbots were affembled: They held burning tapers in their hands: The Great Charter was read before them: They denounced the fentence of excommunication against every one who should thenceforth violate that fundamental law: They threw their tapers on the ground, and exclaimed, May the foul of every one, who incurs this sentence, so slink and corrupt in Hell! The king bore a part in this ceremony; and subjoined: " So help me God, I will keep all these " articles inviolate, as I am a man, as I am a christian, 66 as I am a knight, and as I am a king crowned and

C H A F. " anointed a." Yet was the tremendous ceremony no fooner finished, than his favourites, abusing his weakness, made him return to the same arbitrary and ir-1255. regular administration; and the reasonable expectations of his people were thus perpetually eluded and difappointed b.

T258. Simon de

ALL these imprudent and illegal measures afforded a Mountfort pretence to Simon de Mountfort, earl of Leicester, to atearl of Lei-tempt an innovation in the government, and to wrest the fcepter from the feeble and irrefolute hand which held it. This nobleman was a younger fon of that Simon de Mountfort, who had conducted with fuch valour and renown the Crusade against the Albigenses, and who, though he tarnished his famous exploits by cruelty and ambition, had left a name very precious to all the bigots of that age, particularly to the ecclefiaftics. A large inheritance in England fell by fuccession to this family; but as the elder brother enjoyed still more opulent possessions in France, and could not perform fealty to two mafters, he transferred his right to Simon, his younger brother, who came over to England, did homage for his lands, and was raifed to the dignity of earl of Leicester. In the year 1238, he espoused Eleanor dowager of William earl of Pembroke, and fifter to the king e; but the marriage of this princess with a subject and a foreigner, though contracted with Henry's confent, was loudly complained of by the earl of Cornwal, and all the barons of England; and Leicester was supported against their violence, by the king's favour and authority alone d. But he had no fooner established himself in his possessions and dignities, than he acquired, by infinuation and address, a strong interest with the nation, and gained equally the affections C H A P. of all orders of men. He loft, however, the friendship of Henry from the usual levity and fickleness of that prince; he was banished the court; he was recalled; he was entrusted with the command of Guienne, where he did good fervice and acquired honour; he was again difgraced by the king, and his banishment from court seemed now final and irrevocable. Henry called him traitor to his face; Leicester gave him the lye, and told him, that, if he were not his fovereign, he would foon make him repent of that infult. Yet was this quarrel accommodated either from the good-nature or timidity of the king; and Leicester was again admitted into some degree of favour and authority. But as this nobleman was become too great to preserve an entire complaisance to Henry's humours, and to act in subserviency to his other minions; he found more advantage in cultivating his interest with the public, and in inflaming the general difcontents, which prevailed against the administration. He filled every place with complaints against the infringement of the Great Charter, the acts of violence committed on the people, the combination between the pope and the king in their tyranny and extortions, Henry's neglect of his native fubjects and barons; and though himself a foreigner, he was more loud than any in representing the indignity of fubmitting to the dominion of foreigners. By his hypocritical pretenfions to devotion, he gained the favour of the zealots and clergy: By his feeming concern for public good, he acquired the affections of the public: And besides the private friendships, which he had cultivated with the barons, his animofity against the favourites created an union of interests between him and that powerful order.

a M. Paris, p. 580. Ann. Burt. p. 323. Ann. Waverl. p. 210. W. Heming. p. 571. M. West, p. 353. b M. Paris, p. 597. 608. c Ibid. p. 314. d Ibid, p 315.

A RECENT quarrel, which broke out between Leicefter and William de Valence, Henry's half brother, and

e Rymer, vol. i. p. 459. 513. N 3

C H A P. chief favourite, brought matters to extremity f, and determined the former to give full scope to his bold and unbounded ambition, which the laws and the king's authority had hitherto with difficulty restrained. He secretly called a meeting of the most considerable barons, particularly Humphrey de Bohun, high constable, Roger Bigod, earl mareschal, and the earls of Warwic and Glocester; men, who by their family and possessions stood in the first rank of the English nobility. He represented to this company the necessity of reforming the state, and of putting the execution of the laws into other hands than those which had hitherto appeared, from repeated experience, fo unfit for the charge with which they were entrusted. He exaggerated the oppressions exercised against the lower orders of the state, the violations of the barons' privileges, the continued depredations made on the clergy; and in order to aggravate the enormity of this conduct, he appealed to the Great Charter, which Henry had so often ratified, and which was calculated to prevent for ever the return of those intolerable grievances. He magnified the generofity of their ancestors, who, at a great expence of blood, had extorted that famous concession from the crown; but lamented their own degeneracy, who allowed fo important an advantage, once obtained, to be wrested from them by a weak prince and by infolent strangers. And he infifted, that the king's word, after fo many fubmiffions and fruitless promises on his part, could no longer be relied on; and that nothing but his absolute inability to violate national privileges could henceforth enfure the regular observance of them.

THESE topics, which were founded in truth, and suited fo well the sentiments of the company, had the desired effect; and the barons embraced a resolution of redressing the public grievances, by taking into their own hands the administration of government. Henry having fummoned C H A P. a parliament, in expectation of receiving supplies for his Sicilian project, the barons appeared in the hall, clad in complete armour, and with their fwords by their fide: The king on his entry, struck with the unufual appearance, asked them what was their purpose, and whether they pretended to make him their prisoners? Roger Bigod replied in the name of the rest, that he was not their prisoner, but their sovereign; that they even intended to grant him large fupplies, in order to fix his fon on the throne of Sicily; that they only expected fome return for this expence and fervice; and that, as he had frequently made fubmiffions to the parliament, had acknowledged his past errors, and had still allowed himself to be carried into the same path, which gave them such just reason of complaint, he must now yield to more strict regulations, and confer authority on those who were able and willing to redrefs the national grievances. Henry, partly allured by the hopes of fupply, partly intimidated by the union and martial appearance of the barons, agreed to their demand; and promifed to fummon another parliament at Oxford, in order to digest the new plan of government, and to elect the persons, who were to be entrusted with the chief authority.

f M. Paris, p. 649.

This parliament, which the royalists, and even the It June. nation, from experience of the confusions that attended of Oxford its measures, afterwards denominated the mad parliament, met on the day appointed; and as all the barons brought along with them their military vaffals, and appeared with an armed force, the king, who had taken no precautions against them, was in reality a prisoner in their hands, and was obliged to fubmit to all the terms which they were pleased to impose upon him. Twelve barons were selected from among the king's ministers; twelve more were

2 Annal. Theokefbury.

CHAP. chosen by parliament: To these twenty-four, unlimited authority was granted to reform the flate; and the king himself took an oath, that he would maintain whatever ordinances they should think proper to enact for that purpose h. Leicester was at the head of this supreme council, to which the legislative power was thus in reality transferred; and all their measures were taken by his fecret influence and direction. Their first step bore a specious appearance, and feemed well calculated for the end, which they professed to be the object of all these innovations: They ordered that four knights should be chosen by each county; that they should make enquiry into the grievances of which their neighbourhood had reason to complain, and should attend the ensuing parliament, in order to give information to that affembly of the flate of their particular counties i: A nearer approach to our prefent constitution than had been made by the barons in the reign of king John, when the knights were only appointed to meet in their several counties, and there to draw up a detail of their grievances. Meanwhile the twenty-four barons proceeded to enact some regulations, as a redress of fuch grievances as were supposed to be sufficiently notorious. They ordered, that three fessions of parliament should be regularly held every year, in the months of February, June, and October; that a new sheriff should be annually elected by the votes of the freeholders in each county k; that the sheriffs should have no power of fining the barons who did not attend their courts, or the circuits of the justiciaries; that no heirs should be committed to the wardship of foreigners, and no castles intrusted to their custody; and that no new warrens or forests should be created, nor the revenues of any counties or hundreds be let to farm. Such were the regulations

which

h Rymer, vol. i. p. 655. Chron. Dunst, vol. i. p. 334. Knyghtong i M. Paris, p. 657. Addit, p. 140. Ann. Burt. p. 412. k Chron, Dunft. vol. i. p. 336.

which the twenty-four barons established at Oxford, for C H A P.
the redress of public grievances.

But the earl of Leicester and his affociates, having ad-

But the earl of Leicester and his affociates, having advanced fo far to fatisfy the nation, instead of continuing in this popular course, or granting the king that supply which they had promifed him, immediately provided for the extension and continuance of their own authority. They rouzed anew the popular clamour, which had long prevailed against foreigners; and they fell with the utmost violence on the king's half-brothers, who were supposed to be the authors of all national grievances, and whom Henry had no longer any power to protect. The four brothers, fensible of their danger, took to flight, with an intention of making their escape out of the kingdom; they were eagerly purfued by the barons: Aymer, one of the brothers, who had been elected to the see of Winchester, took shelter in his episcopal palace, and carried the others along with him; they were furrounded in that place, and threatened to be dragged out by force, and to be punished for their crimes and misdemeanors; and the king, pleading the sacredness of an ecclefiaftical fanctuary, was glad to extricate them from this danger by banishing them the kingdom. In this act of violence, as well as in the former usurpations of the barons, the queen and her uncles were thought to have fecretly concurred; being jealous of the credit acquired by the brothers, which, they found, had eclipfed and annihilated their own.

But the subsequent proceedings of the twenty-four Usurpations barons were sufficient to open the eyes of the nation, of the barand to prove their intention of reducing for ever both the king and the people under the arbitrary power of a very narrow aristocracy, which must at last have terminated either in anarchy, or in a violent usurpation and tyranny. They pretended, that they had not yet digested all the regulations necessary for the reformation of the state, and

· or

C H A P. for the redress of grievances; and that they must still retain their power, till that great purpose were thoroughly effected: In other words, that they must be perpetual governors, and must continue to reform, till they were pleased to abdicate their authority. They formed an association among themselves, and swore that they would fland by each other with their lives and fortunes: They displaced all the chief officers of the crown, the justiciary, the chancellor, the treasurer; and advanced either themfelves or their own creatures in their place: Even the offices of the king's household were disposed of at their pleasure: The government of all the castles was put into hands in whom they found reason to confide: And the whole power of the flate being thus transferred to them, they ventured to impose an oath; by which all the subjects were obliged to fwear, under the penalty of being declared public enemies, that they would obey and execute all the regulations, both known and unknown, of the twenty-four barons: And all this, for the greater glory of God, the honour of the church, the fervice of the king, and the advantage of the kingdom!. No one dared to withstand this tyrannical authority: Prince Edward himfelf, the king's eldeft fon, a youth of eighteen, who began to give indications of that great and manly spirit, which appeared throughout the whole course of his life, was, after making some opposition, constrained to take that oath, which really deposed his father and his family from fovereign authority m. Earl Warrenne was the last person in the kingdom, that could be brought to give the confederated barons this mark of submission.

But the twenty-four barons, not content with the usurpation of the royal power, introduced an innovation in the constitution of parliament, which was of the utmost importance. They ordained, that this assembly

¹ Chron. T. Wykes, p. 52.

m Ann. Burt. p. 411.

should chuse a committee of twelve persons, who should, C H A P. in the intervals of the fessions, possess the authority of the whole parliament, and should attend on a summons the person of the king, in all his motions. But so powerful were these barons, that this regulation was also fubmitted to; the whole government was overthrown or fixed on new foundations; and the monarchy was totally fubverted, without its being possible for the king to strike a fingle stroke in defence of the constitution against the newly erected oligarchy.

1259-

THE report, that the king of the Romans intended to pay a visit to England, gave alarm to the ruling barons, who dreaded left the extensive influence and established authority of that prince would be employed to restore the prerogatives of his family, and overturn their plan of government ". They fent over the bishop of Worcester, who met him at St. Omars; asked him, in the name of the barons, the reason of his journey, and how long he intended to flay in England; and infifted, that, before he entered the kingdom, he should swear to observe the regulations established at Oxford. On Richard's refusal to take this oath, they prepared to resist him as a public enemy; they fitted out a fleet, affembled an army, and exciting the inveterate prejudices of the people against foreigners, from whom they had fuffered so many oppressions, spread the report that Richard, attended by a number of strangers, meant to restore by force the authority of his exiled brothers, and to violate all the fecurities provided for public liberty. The king of the Romans was at last obliged to submit to the terms required of him ?.

Bur the barons, in proportion to their continuance in power, began gradually to lose that popularity, which had affifted them in obtaining it; and men repined, that

o Ibid. p. 661, 662. Chron. T. Wykes, n M. Paris, p. 661.

P. 53.

regulations,

C H A P. regulations, which were occasionally established, for the reformation of the flate, were likely to become perpetual, and to subvert entirely the ancient constitution. They were apprehensive, lest the power of the nobles, always oppressive, should now exert itself without controul, by removing the counterpoise of the crown; and their fears were increased by some new edicts of the barons, which were plainly calculated to procure to themfelves an impunity in all their violences. They appointed, that the circuits of the itinerant justices, the fole check on their arbitrary conduct, should be held only once in feven years; and men eafily faw, that a remedy, which returned after fuch long intervals, against an oppressive power, which was perpetual, would prove totally infignificant and useless P. The cry became loud in the nation, that the barons should finish their intended regulations. The knights of the shires, who seem now to have been pretty regularly affembled, and fometimes in a separate house, made remonstrances against the slowness of their proceedings. They represented, that, though the king had performed all the conditions required of him, the barons had hitherto done nothing for the public good, and had only been careful to promote their own private advantage, and to make inroads on royal authority; and they even appealed to prince Edward, and claimed his interpolition for the interests of the nation, and the reformation of the government q. The prince replied, that, though it was from constraint, and contrary to his private fentiments, he had fworn to maintain the provifions of Oxford, he was determined to observe his oath: But he fent a meffage to the barons, requiring them to bring their undertaking to a speedy conclusion, and fulfil their engagements to the public: Otherwife, he menaced them, that, at the expence of his life, he would oblige them to do their duty, and would flied the last drop of C H A P. his blood in promoting the interests, and fatisfying the just wishes of the nation.

P M. Paris, p. 667. Trivet, p. 209.

THE barons, urged by fo pressing a necessity, published at last a new code of ordinances for the reformation of the state : But the expectations of the people were extremely disappointed, when they found, that these confifted only of fome trivial alterations in the municipal law; and still more, when the barons pretended, that the talk was not yet finished, and that they must farther prolong their authority, in order to bring the work of reformation to the defired period. The current of popularity was now much turned to the fide of the crown; and the barons had little to rely on for their support, besides the private influence and power of their families. which, though exorbitant, was likely to prove inferior to the combination of king and people. Even this basis of power was daily weakened by their intestine jealousies and animolities; their ancient and inveterate quarrels broke out when they came to share the spoils of the crown; and the rivalship between the earls of Leicester and Glocefter, the chief leaders among them, began to disjoint the whole confederacy. The latter, more moderate in his pretentions, was defirous of stopping or retarding the career of the barons' usurpations; but the former, enraged at the opposition which he met with in his own party, pretended to throw up all concern in English affairs; and he retired into France t.

THE kingdom of France, the only state with which England had any considerable intercourse, was at this time governed by Lewis IX. a prince of the most singular character that is to be met with in all the records of history. This monarch united, to the mean and abject superstition of a monk, all the courage and magnanimity

r Annal. Burt. p. 427, s Ibid. p. 428, 439. t Chron. Dunft, vol. i. p. 348.

CHAP. of the greatest hero; and, what may be deemed more extraordinary, the justice and integrity of a disinterested patriot, the mildness and humanity of an accomplished 1259. philosopher. So far from taking advantage of the divisions among the English, or attempting to expel those dangerous rivals from the provinces, which they still possessed in France; he had entertained many scruples with regard to the fentence of attainder pronounced against the king's father, had even expressed some intention of restoring the other provinces, and was only prevented from taking that imprudent refolution, by the united remonstrances of his own barons, who represented the extreme danger of fuch a measure ", and, what had a greater influence on Lewis, the justice of punishing by a legal fentence the barbarity and felony of John. Whenever this prince interposed in English affairs, it was always with an intention of composing the differences between the king and his nobility; he recommended to both parties every peaceable and reconciling measure; and he used all his authority with the earl of Leicester, his native subject, to bend him to a compliance with Henry. He made a treaty with England, at a time zoth May. when the distractions of that kingdom were at the greatest height, and when the king's authority was totally annihilated; and the terms, which he granted, might, even in a more prosperous state of their affairs, be deemed reasonable and advantageous to the English. He yielded up some territories which had been conquered from Poictou and Guienne; he ensured the peaceable possession of the latter province to Henry; he agreed to pay that prince a large fum of money; and he only required that the king should, in return, make a final cession of Normandy, and the other provinces, which he could never entertain any hopes of recovering by force of arms w.

u M. Paris, p. 604.

w Rymer, vol. i. p. 675. M. Paris, p. 566.

Chron. T. Wykes, p. 53. Trivet, p. 208. M. West. p. 371.

This

This cession was ratified by Henry, by his two sons, and C H A P. two daughters, and by the king of the Romans and his three fons: Leicester alone, either moved by a vain arrogance, or desirous to ingratiate himself with the English populace, protested against the deed, and insisted on the right, however distant, which might accrue to his confort*. Lewis faw in his obstinacy the unbounded ambition of the man; and as the barons infifted, that the money, due by treaty, should be at their disposal, not at Henry's, he also faw, and probably with regret, the low condition, to which this monarch, who had more erred from weakness than from any bad intentions, was reduced by the turbulence of his own subjects.

1261

But the situation of Henry soon after wore a more favourable aspect. The twenty-four barons had now enjoyed the fovereign power near three years; and had visibly employed it, not for the reformation of the state, which was their first pretence, but for the aggrandizement of themselves and of their families. The breach of trust was apparent to all the world: Every order of men felt it, and murmured against it: The dissensions among the barons themselves, which encreased the evil, made also the remedy more obvious and easy: And the fecret desertion in particular of the earl of Glocester to the crown, feemed to promife Henry certain success in any attempt to resume his authority. Yet durst he not take that step, so reconcilable both to justice and policy, without making a previous application to Rome, and defiring an absolution from his oaths and engagements y.

THE pope was at this time much diffatisfied with the conduct of the barons; who, in order to gain the favour of the people and clergy of England, had expelled all the Italian ecclefiaftics, had confiscated their benefices, and x Chron, T. Wykes, p. 53.

y Ann. Burt, p. 389.

feemed

C H A P. feemed determined to maintain the liberties and privileges of the English church, in which the rights of patronage, belonging to their own families, were included. The extreme animofity of the English clergy against the Italians was also a source of his difgust to this order; and an attempt, which had been made by them for farther liberty and greater independance on the civil power, was therefore less acceptable to the court of Rome 2. About the fame time, that the barons at Oxford had annihilated the prerogatives of the monarchy, the clergy met in a fynod at Merton, and paffed several ordinances, which were no less calculated to promote their own grandeur at the expence of the crown. They decreed, that it was unlawful to try ecclesiastics by secular judges; that the clergy were not to regard any prohibitions from civil courts; that laypatrons had no right to confer spiritual benefices; that the magistrate was obliged, without farther enquiry, to imprison all excommunicated persons; and that ancient usage, without any particular grant or charter, was a fufficient authority for any clerical possessions or privileges a. About a century before, these claims would have been supported by the court of Rome beyond the most fundamental articles of faith: They were the chief points maintained by the great martyr, Becket; and his refolution in defending them had exalted him to the high station which he held in the catalogue of Romish faints. But principles were changed with the times: The pope was become fomewhat jealous of the great independance of the English clergy, which made them stand less in need of his protection, and even emboldened them to refift his authority, and to complain of the preference given to the Italian courtiers, whose interests, it is natural to imagine, were the chief object of his concern. He was ready therefore, on the king's application, to

z Rymer, vol. i. p. 755.

a Ann. Burt. p. 389.

And, at the same time, he absolved the king and all his fubjects from the oath which they had taken to observe the provisions of Oxford c.

PRINCE Edward, whose liberal mind, though in such Prince Edsearly youth, had taught him the great prejudice, which ward, his father had incurred, by his levity, inconstancy, and frequent breach of promise, refused for a long time to take advantage of this absolution; and declared that the provisions of Oxford, how unreasonable soever in themselves, and how much soever abused by the barons, ought still to be adhered to by those who had sworn to observe them 4: He himself had been constrained by violence to take that oath; yet was he determined to keep it. By this scrupulous sidelity, the prince acquired the considerate of all parties, and was afterwards enabled to recover sully the royal authority, and to perform such great actions both during his own reign and that of his father.

THE fituation of England, during this period, as well as that of most European kingdoms, was somewhat peculiar. There was no regular military force maintained in the nation: The sword, however, was not, properly speaking, in the hands of the people: The barons were alone entrusted with the defence of the community; and after any effort, which they made, either against their own prince, or against foreigners, as the military retainers departed home, the armies were disbanded, and could not speedily be re-assembled at pleasure. It was easy therefore, for a few barons, by a combination, to get the start of the other party, to collect suddenly their troops, and to appear unexpectedly in the field with an army, which

b Rymer, vol. i. p. 755.

e Rymer, vol. i. p. 722. M. Paris, p. 666. W. Heming. p. 580. Ypod. Neuf. p. 468. Knyghton, p. 2446.

d M. Paris, p. 667.

C H A P. their antagonists, though equal or even superior in power and interest, would not dare to encounter. Hence the fudden revolutions, which often took place in those go-1261. vernments: Hence the frequent victories obtained without a blow by one faction over the other: And hence it happened, that the feeming prevalence of a party, was feldom a prognostic of its long continuance in power and authority.

THE king, as foon as he received the pope's abfolution 1262. from his oath, accompanied with menaces of excommunication against all opponents, trusting to the countenance of the church, to the support promifed him by many confiderable barons, and to the returning favour of the people, immediately took off the mask. After justifying his conduct by a proclamation, in which he fet forth the private ambition, and the breach of truft, conspicuous in Leicester and his associates, he declared, that he had refumed the government, and was determined thenceforth to exert the royal authority for the protection of his subjects. He removed Hugh le Despenser and Nicholas de Ely, the justiciary and chancellor appointed by the barons; and put Philip Baffet and Walter de Merton in their place. He substituted new sheriffs in all the counties, men of character and honour: He placed new governors in most of the castles: He changed all the officers of his houfhold: He fummoned a parliament, in which the refumption of his authority was ratified, with only five diffenting voices: And the barons, after making one fruitless effort, to take the king by furprize at Winchester, were obliged to acquiesce in those new regulations e.

> THE king, in order to cut off every objection to his conduct, offered to refer all the differences between him

c M. Paris, p. £68. Chron. T. Wykes, p. 55.

and

23 April.

and the earl of Leicester, to Margaret queen of France f. C HAP. The celebrated integrity of Lewis gave a mighty influence to any decision which issued from his court; and Henry probably hoped, that the gallantry, on which all barons, as true knights, valued themselves, would make them ashamed not to submit to the award of that princess. Lewis merited the confidence reposed in him. By an admirable conduct, probably as political as just, he continually interposed his good offices to allay the civil discords of the English: He forwarded all healing measures, which might give fecurity to both parties: And he still endeavoured, though in vain, to footh by persuasion the fierce ambition of the earl of Leicester, and to convince him how much it was his duty to fubmit peaceably to the authority of his fovereign.

12830

THAT bold and artful conspirator was nowise discouraged by the bad fuccess of his past enterprizes. The death of Richard earl of Glocester, who was his chief rival in power, and who, before his decease, had joined the royal party, feemed to open a new field to his violence, and to expose the throne to fresh insults and injuries. It was in vain, that the king professed his intentions of observing strictly the great charter, even of maintaining all the regulations made by the reforming barons at Oxford or afterwards, except those which entirely annihilated the royal authority: These powerful chiestains. now obnoxious to the court, could not peaceably refign the hopes of entire independance and uncontrouled power, with which they had flattered themselves, and which they had fo long enjoyed. Many of them engaged in Leicef-Civil wars ter's views, and among the rest, Gilbert, the young earl rons. of Glocester, who brought him a mighty accession of power, from the extensive authority possessed by that opu-

C H A P. lent family. Even Henry, son of the king of the Romans, commonly called Henry d'Allmaine, though a prince of the blood, joined the party of the barons against the king, the head of his own family. Leicester himself, who still resided in France, secretly formed the links of this great conspiracy, and planned the whole scheme of operations.

THE princes of Wales, notwithstanding the great power of the monarchs, both of the Saxon and Norman line, still preserved authority in their own country. Though they had often been conftrained to pay tribute to the crown of England, they were with difficulty retained in subordination or even in peace; and almost through every reign fince the conquest, they had infested the English frontiers with such petty incursions and sudden inroads, as feldom merit to have place in a general history. The English, still content with repelling their invafions, and chacing them back into their mountains, had never purfued the advantages obtained over them, nor been able, even under their greatest and most active princes, to fix a total, or fo much as a feudal fubjection on the country. This advantage was referved to the prefent king, the weakest and most indolent. In the year 1237, Lewellyn, prince of Wales, declining in years and broken with infirmities, but still more harassed with the rebellion and undutiful behaviour of his younger fon, Griffin, had recourse to the protection of Henry; and consenting to fubject his principality, which had so long maintained, or foon recovered, its independance, to vaffalage under the crown of England, had purchased security and tranquillity on these dishonourable terms. His eldest son and heir, David, renewed the homage to England; and having taken his brother prisoner, delivered him into Henry's hands, who committed him to custody in the Tower. That prince, endeavouring to make his escape, lost his life in the attempt; and the prince of Wales, freed from C H A P. the apprehensions of so dangerous a rival, paid thenceforth less regard to the English monarch, and even renewed those incursions, by which the Welsh, during so many ages, had been accustomed to infest the English borders. Lewellyn, however, the fon of Griffin, who succeeded to his uncle, had been obliged to renew the homage, which was now claimed by England as an established right; but he was well pleased to inflame those civil discords, on which he rested his present security, and sounded his hopes of future independance. He entered into a confederacy with the earl of Leicester, and collecting all the force of his principality, invaded England with an army of 30,000 men. He ravaged the lands of Roger de Mortimer and of all the barons, who adhered to the crown s; he marched into Cheshire, and committed like depredations on prince Edward's territories; every place, where his diforderly troops appeared, was laid waste with fire and fword; and though Mortimer, a gallant and expert foldier, made stout refistance, it was found necessary, that the prince himself should head the army against this invader. Edward repulfed prince Lewellyn, and obliged him to take shelter in the mountains of North Wales: But he was prevented from making farther progress against the enemy, by the diforders, which foon after broke out in England.

life

THE Welsh invasion was the appointed fignal for the malcontent barons to rife in arms; and Leicester, coming over fecretly from France, collected all the forces of his party, and commenced an open rebellion. He feized the perfon of the bishop of Hereford; a prelate obnoxious to all the inferior clergy, on account of his devoted attachment to the court of Rome h. Simon, bishop of Norwich, and g Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 354.

h Trivet, p. 211. M. West.

p. 382. 393.

C H A P. John Mansel, because they had published the pope's buil, , absolving the king and kingdom from their oaths to obferve the provisions of Oxford, were made prisoners, and 1263. exposed to the rage of the party. The king's demefnes were ravaged with unbounded fury i; and as it was Leicester's interest to allure to his side, by the hopes of plunder, all the diforderly ruffians in England, he gave them a general licence to pillage the barons of the opposite party, and even all neutral persons. But one of the principal resources of his faction was the populace of the cities, particularly of London; and as he had, by his hypocritical pretentions to fanctity, and his zeal against Rome, engaged the monks and lower ecclefiaftics in his party, his dominion over the inferior ranks of men became uncontroulable. Thomas Fitz-Richard, mayor of London, a furious and licentious man, gave the countenance of authority to these disorders in the capital; and having declared war against the substantial citizens, he loofered all the bands of government, by which that turbulent city was commonly but ill restrained. On the approach of Easter, the zeal of superstition, the appetite for plunder, or what is often as prevalent with the populace as either of these motives, the pleasure of committing havec and destruction, prompted them to attack the unhappy Jews, who were first pillaged without refistance, then massicred, to the number of five hundred persons k. The Lombard bankers were next exposed to the rage of the people; and though, by taking fanctuary in the churches, they escaped with their lives, all their money and goods became a prey to the licentious multitude. Even the houses of the rich citizens, though English, were attacked by night:

i Trivet, p. 211. M. West. p. 382. k Chron. T. Wykes, p. 59. terrified and way was made by fword and by fire to the pillage of their goods, and often to the destruction of their persons. The queen, who, though defended by the Tower, was terrified by the neighbourhood of fuch dangerous com-C HAP. motions, refolved to go by water to the castle of Windsor; but as she approached the bridge, the populace assembled against her: The cry ran, drown the witch; and besides abusing her with the most opprobrious language, and pelting her with rotten eggs and dirt, they had prepared large stones to sink her barge, when she should attempt to shoot the bridge; and she was so frightened that she returned to the Tower.

THE violence and fury of Leicester's faction had risen to fuch a height in all parts of England, that the king, unable to refift their power, was obliged to fet on foot a treaty of peace; and to make an accommodation with the barons on the most disadvantageous terms m. He agreed 18th July. to confirm anew the provisions of Oxford, even those which entirely annihilated the royal authority; and the barons were again re-instated in the sovereignty of the kingdom. They restored Hugh le Despenser to the office of chief justiciary; they appointed their own creatures sheriffs in every county of England; they took poffession of all the royal castles and fortresses; they even named all the officers of the king's houshold; and they fummoned a parliament to meet at Westminister in order 14th Oct. to settle more fully their plan of government. They here produced a new lift of twenty-four barons, to whom they proposed, that the administration should be entirely committed; and they infifted, that the authority of this junto should continue, not only during the reign of the king, but also during that of prince Edward.

This prince, the life and foul of the royal party, had unhappily, before the king's accommodation with the barons, been taken prisoner by Leicester in a parley at Windsor, and that misfortune, more than any other

¹ Chron. T. Wykes, p. 57.

m Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 358.

Trivet, p. 211.

n M. Paris, p. 669. Trivet, p. 213.

C H A P. incident, had determined Henry to fubmit to the ignominious conditions imposed upon him. But Edward, having recovered his liberty by the treaty, employed his 1263. activity in defending the prerogatives of his family; and he gained a great part even among those who had at first adhered to the cause of the barons. His cousin, Henry d'Allmaine, Roger Bigod earl mareshal, earl Warrenne, Humphrey Bohun earl of Hereford, John lord Baffet, Ralph Baffet, Hamond l'Estrange, Roger Mortimer, Henry de Piercy, Robert de Brus, Roger de Leybourne, with almost all the Lords Marchers, as they were called, on the borders of Wales and of Scotland, the most warlike parts of the kingdom, declared in favour of the royal cause; and hosfilities, which were scarcely well composed, were again renewed in every part of England. But the near balance of the parties, joined to the universal clamour of the people, obliged the king and barons to open anew the negotiations for peace; and it was agreed by both fides to fubmit their differences to the arbitration of the king of Reference of France. France .

THIS virtuous prince, the only man, who, in like to the king circumstances, could fafely have been intrusted with fuch an authority by a neighbouring nation, had never ceased to interpose his good offices between the English factions; and had even, during the short interval of peace, invited over to Paris both the king and the earl of Leicester, in order to accommodate the differences between them; but found, that the fears and animofities on both fides, as well as the ambition of Leicester, were fo violent, as to render all his endeavours ineffectual. But when this folemn appeal, ratified by the oaths and fubscriptions of the leaders in both factions, was made to his judgment, he was not discouraged from pursuing his

o M, Paris, p. 668. Chron. T. Wykes, p. 58. W. Heming. p. 580. Chron. Dunft, vol. i. p. 363.

honourable purpose: He summoned the states of France C H A P. at Amiens; and there, in the presence of that assembly, as well as in that of the king of England and Peter de 1264. Montfort, Leicester's son, he brought this great cause to a trial and examination. It appeared to him, that the provisions of Oxford, even had they not been extorted by force, had they not been so exorbitant in their nature and subversive of the ancient constitution, were expressly established as a temporary expedient, and could not, without breach of trust, be rendered perpetual by the barons. He therefore annulled these provisions; restored to the king 23d Jan. the possession of his castles, and the power of nomination to the great offices; allowed him to retain what foreigners he pleased in his kingdom, and even to confer on them places of trust and dignity; and in a word, re-established the royal power in the fame condition on which it flood before the meeting of the parliament at Oxford. But while he thus suppressed dangerous innovations, and preferved unimpaired the prerogatives of the English crown, he was not negligent of the rights of the people; and befides ordering that a general amnesty should be granted for all past offences, he declared, that his award was not any wife meant to derogate from the privileges and liberties which the nation enjoyed by any former concessions or charters of the crown P.

This equitable fentence was no sooner known in England, than Leicester and his confederates determined to reject it, and to have recourse to arms, in order to procure to themselves more safe and advantageous conditions. Without regard to his oaths and subscriptenewal of tions, that enterprising conspirator directed his two the civil sons, Richard and Peter de Montsort, in conjunction with Robert de Ferrars, earl of Derby, to attack the city

p Rymer, vol. i. p. 776. 777, &c. Chron. T. Wykes, p. 58. Knyghton, p. 2446. q Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 363.

CHAP. of Worcester; while Henry and Simon de Montfort, two others of his fons, affisted by the prince of Wales, were ordered to lay waste the estate of Roger de Mortimer. He himself resided at London; and employing as his instrument, Fitz-Richard, the seditious mayor, who had violently and illegally prolonged his authority, he wrought up that city to the highest ferment and agitation. The populace formed themselves into bands and companies; chose leaders; practised all military exercises; committed violence on the royalists: And to give them greater countenance in their diforders, an affociation was entered into between the city and eighteen great barons, never to make peace with the king but by common confent and approbation. At the head of those who swore to maintain this affociation, were the earls of Leicester, Glocester, and Derby, with le Despenser, the chief justiciary; men who had all previously fworn to submit to the award of the French monarch. Their only pretence for this breach of faith, was, that the latter part of Lewis's fentence was, as they affirmed, a contradiction to the former: He ratified the charter of liberties, yet annulled the provisions of Oxford; which were only calculated, as they maintained, to preserve that charter; and without which, in their estimation, they had no fecurity for its observance.

> THE king and prince, finding a civil war inevitable. prepared themselves for defence; and summoning the military vaffals from all quarters, and being reinforced by Baliol lord of Galloway, Brus lord of Annandale, Henry Piercy, John Comyn, and other barons of the north, they composed an army, formidable as well from its numbers, as its military prowefs and experience. The first enterprize of the royalists was the attack of Northampton, which was defended by Simon de Montfort, with many of the principal barons of that party: And a breach being made in the walls by Philip Basset, the place was carried C H A P. by assault, and both the governor and the garrison were made prisoners. The royalists marched thence to Leicester and Nottingham; both which places having opened their gates to them, prince Edward proceeded with a detachment into the county of Derby, in order to ravage with fire and sword the lands of the earl of that name, and take revenge on him for his disloyalty. Like maxims of war prevailed with both parties throughout England; and the kingdom was thus exposed in a moment to greater devastation, from the animosities of the rival barons, than it would have suffered from many years of foreign or even domestic hostilities, conducted by more humane and more generous principles.

Rymer, vol. i. p. 772. M. West. p. 385. Ypod. Neuft. p. 469.

THE earl of Leicester, master of London, and of the counties in the fouth-east of England, formed the siege of Rochester, which alone declared for the king in those parts, and which, besides earl Warrenne, the governor, was garrisoned by many noble and powerful barons of the royal party. The king and prince hastened from Nottingham, where they were then quartered, to the relief of the place; and on their approach, Leicester raised the fiege and retreated to London, which, being the center of his power, he was afraid, might, in his absence, fall into the king's hands, either by force, or by a correfpondence with the principal citizens, who were all fecretly inclined to the royal cause. Reinforced by a great body of Londoners, and having fummoned his partizans from all quarters, he thought himself strong enough to hazard a general battle with the royalifts, and to determine the fate of the nation in one great engagement; which, if it proved fuccessful, must be decisive against the king, who had no retreat for his broken troops in those parts; while Leicester himself, in case of any finifter accident, could eafily take shelter in the city. To give the better colouring to his cause, he previously sent a message

C H A P. a message with conditions of peace to Henry, submissive in the language, but exorbitant in the demands; and when the messenger returned with the lie and desiance from the king, the prince, and the king of the Romans, he fent a new message, renouncing, in the name of himfelf and of the affociated barons, all fealty and allegiance to Henry. He then marched out of the city with his army, divided into four bodies: The first commanded by his two sons, Henry and Guy de Montfort, together with Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hereford, who had deferted to the barons; the fecond led by the earl of Glocester, with William de Montchesney and John Fitz-John; the third, composed of Londoners, under the command of Nicholas de Segrave; the fourth headed by himself in person. The bishop of Chichester gave a general absolution to the army, accompanied with affurances, that, if any of them fell in the ensuing action, they would infallibly be received into heaven, as the reward of their fuffering in fo meritorious a cause.

Battle of Lewes. 14th May.

LEICESTER, who possessed great talents for war, conducted his march with such skill and secrecy, that he had well nigh surprized the royalists in their quarters at Lewes in Sussex: But the vigilance and activity of prince Edward soon repaired this negligence; and he led out the king's army to the field in three bodies. He himself conducted the van, attended by earl Warrenne and William de Valence: The main body was commanded by the king of the Romans and his son Henry: The king himself was placed in the rear at the head of his principal nobility. Prince Edward rushed upon the Londoners, who had demanded the post of honour in leading the rebel army, but who, from their ignorance of discipline and want of experience, were ill sitted to resist the gentry and military men, of whom the prince's body was composed. They were broken in an instant; were chased off the field; and Edward, trans-C H A P. ported by his martial ardour, and eager to revenge the insolence of the Londoners against his mother t, put them to the fword for the length of four miles, without giving them any quarter, and without reflecting on the fate. which in the mean time attended the rest of the army. The earl of Leicester, seeing the royalists thrown into confusion by their eagerness in the pursuit, led on his remaining troops against the bodies commanded by the two royal brothers: He defeated with great flaughter the forces headed by the king of the Romans; and that prince was obliged to yield himself prisoner to the earl of Glocester: He penetrated to the body, where the king himfelf was placed, threw it into diforder, purfued his advantage, chased it into the town of Lewes, and obliged Henry to furrender himself prisoner ".

5 M. Paris, p. 669. W. Heming. p. 583.

PRINCE Edward, returning to the field of battle from his precipitate pursuit of the Londoners, was astonished to find it covered with the dead bodies of his friends, and still more to hear, that his father and uncle were defeated and taken prisoners, and that Arundel, Comyn, Brus, Hamon l'Estrange, Roger Leybourne, and many considerable barons of his party, were in the hands of the victorious enemy. Earl Warrenne, Hugh Bigod, and William de Valence, struck with despair at this event, immediately took to flight, hurried to Pevencey, and made their escape beyond sea w: But the prince, intrepid amidst the greatest disasters, exhorted his troops to revenge the death of their friends, to relieve the royal captives. and to fnatch an eafy conquest from an enemy, disordered by their own victory x. He found his followers intimidated by their fituation; while Leicester, afraid of a sud-

t M. Paris, p. 670. Chron. T. Wykes, p. 62. W. Heming. p. 583. M. West. p. 387. Ypod. Neust. p. 469. H. Knyghton, p. 2450.

u M. Paris, p. 670. M. West. p. 387. w Chron. T. Wykes, p. 62. w Heming, p. 584.

C H A P. den and violent blow from the prince, amused him by a feigned negociation, till he was able to recal his troops from the pursuit, and to bring them into order y. There now appeared no farther resource to the royal party; furrounded by the armies and garrifons of the enemy, deftitute of forage and provisions, and deprived of their fovereign, as well as of their principal leaders, who could alone inspirit them to an obstinate resistance. The prince, therefore, was obliged to submit to Leicester's terms, which were short and severe, agreeably to the suddenness and necessity of the situation. He stipulated, that he and Henry d'Allmaine should surrender themselves prisoners as pledges in lieu of the two kings; that all other prisoners on both fides fhould be released z; and that in order to fettle fully the terms of agreement, application should be made to the king of France, that he should name fix Frenchmen, three prelates, and three noblemen: Thefe fix to chuse two others of their own country: And these two to chuse one Englishman, who, in conjunction with themselves, were to be invested by both parties with full powers to make what regulations they thought proper for the fett ement of the kingdom. The prince and young Henry accordingly delivered themselves into Leicester's hands, who fent them under a guard to Dover castle. Such are the terms of agreement, commonly called the Mile of Lewes, from an obsolete French term of that meaning: For it appears, that all the gentry and nobility of England, who valued themselves on their Norman extraction, and who disdained the language of their native country, made familiar use of the French tongue, till this period, and for fome time after.

LEICESTER had no fooner obtained this great advantage, and gotten the whole royal family in his power,

y W. Heming. p. 584. z M. Paris, p. 671. Knyghton, p. 2451.

than he openly violated every article of the treaty, and C H A P. acted as fole mafter, and even tyrant of the kingdom. He still detained the king in effect a prisoner, and made use of that prince's authority to purposes the most prejudicial to his interests, and the most oppressive of his people 2. He every where difarmed the royalifts, and kept all his own partizans in a military posture b: He observed the same partial conduct in the deliverance of the captives, and even threw many of the royalists into prison, besides those who were taken in the battle of Lewes: He carried the king from place to place, and obliged all the royal castles, on pretence of Henry's commands, to receive a governor and garrison of his own appointment: All the officers of the crown and of the household were named by him; and the whole authority, as well as arms of the state, was lodged in his hands: He instituted in the counties a new kind of magistracy, endowed with new and arbitrary powers, that of conservators of the peace : His avarice appeared barefaced, and might induce us to question the greatness of his ambition, at least the largeness of his mind, if we had not reason to think, that he intended to employ his acquisitions as the instruments for attaining farther power and grandeur. He seized the estates of no less than eighteen barons, as his share of the spoil gained in the battle of Lewes: He engroffed to himself the ranfom of all the prisoners; and told his barons, with a wanton insolence, that it was sufficient for them, that he had faved them by that victory from the forfeitures and attainders which hung over them d: He even treated the earl of Glocester in the same injurious manner, and applied to his own use the ransom of the king of the Romans, who in the field of battle had yielded himfelf pri-

b Ibid, p. 795. Brady's a Rymer, vol. i. p. 790, 791, &c. appeals, No. 211, 212. Chron. T. Wykes, p. 63. c Rimer, vol. i. d Knyghton, p. 2451. foner

C H A P. foner to that nobleman. Henry, his eldest fon, made a monopoly of all the wool in the kingdom, the only valuable commodity for foreign markets which it at that time produced . The inhabitants of the cinque-ports, during the present dissolution of government, betook themselves to the most licentious piracy, preyed on the thips of all nations, threw the mariners into the fea, and by these practices soon banished all merchants from the English coasts and harbours. Every foreign commodity rofe to an exorbitant price; and woollen cloth, which the English had not then the art of dying, was worn by them white, and without receiving the last hand of the manufacturer. In answer to the complaints which arose on this occasion, Leicester replied, that the kingdom could well enough subfift within itself, and needed no intercourse with foreigners. And it was found, that he even combined with the pyrates of the cinque-ports, and received as his share the third of their prizes f.

No farther mention was made of the reference to the king of France, so essential an article in the agreement of Lewes; and Leicester summoned a parliament, composed altogether of his own partizans, in order to rivet, by their authority, that power, which he had acquired by so much violence, and which he used with so much tyranny and injustice. An ordinance was there passed, to which the king's consent had been previously extorted, that every act of royal power should be exercised by a council of nine persons, who were to be chosen and removed by the majority of three, Leicester himself, the earl of Glocester, and the bishop of Chichester s. By this intricate plan of government, the scepter was really put into Leicester's hands; as he had the entire direction of the bishop of Chichester, and thereby commanded all the resolutions

e Chron. T. Wykes, p. 65. p. 793. Brady's App. No. 213. f Ibid.

g Rymer, vol. is of the council of three, who could appoint or discard at C H A P. pleasure every member of the supreme council.

But it was impossible that things could long remain in this strange situation. It behoved Leicester either to descend with some peril into the rank of a subject, or to mount up with no less into that of a sovereign; and his ambition, unrestrained either by fear or by pinciple, gave too much reason to suspect him of the latter irtention. Mean while, he was exposed to anxiety from every quarter; and felt that the fmallest incident was capable of overturning that immense and ill-cemented fabric, which he had reared. The queen, whom her husband had left abroad, had collected in foreign parts an army of desperate adventurers, and had affembled a great number of ships, with a view of invading the kingdom, and of bringing relief to her unfortunate family. Lewis, detefting Leicester's usurpations and perjuries, and disgusted at the English barons, who had refused to submit to his award, secretly favoured all her enterprizes, and was generally believed to be making preparations for the same purpose. An English army, by the pretended authority of the captiveking, was affembled on the sea-coast to oppose this projected invasion 1; but Leicester owed his safety more to cross winds, which long detained and at last dispersed and rained the queen's fleet, than to any relistance, which, in their present situation, could have been expected from the English.

LEICESTER found himself better able to resist the spiritual thunders, which were levelled against him. The pope, still adhering to the king's cause against the barons, dispatched cardinal Guido as his legate into England, with orders to excommunicate by name the three earls, Leicester, Glocester, and Norfolk, and all others in general, who concurred in the oppression and captivity of h Brady's App. No 216, 217. Chron. Dunft. vol i. p. 373. M. Weft.

C H A P. their fovereign 1. Leicester menaced the legate with death, if he fet foot within the kingdom; but Guido, meeting in France the bishops of Winchester, London, 1264. and Worcester, who had been sent thither on a negociation, commanded them, under the penalty of ecclesiastical censures, to carry his bull into England, and to publish it against the barons. When the prelates arrived off the coast, they were boarded by the pyratical mariners of the cinque-ports, to whom probably they gave a hint of the cargo, which they brought along with them: The bull was torn and thrown into the fea; which furnished the artful prelates with a plaufible excuse for not obeying the orders of the legate. Leicester appealed from Guido to the pope in person; but before the ambassadors, appointed to defend his cause, could reach Rome, the pope was dead; and they found the legate himself, from whom they had appealed, feated on the papal throne, by the name of Urban IV. That daring leader was no wife difmayed with this incident; and as he found that a great part of his popularity in England was founded on his opposition to the court of Rome, which was now become odious, he perfifted with the more obstinacy in the profecution of his meafures.

1265. 20th Jan. That he might both encrease, and turn to advantage his popularity, Leicester summoned a new parliament in London, where, he knew, his power was uncontrolable; and he fixed this assembly on a more democratical basis, than any which had ever been summoned since the foundation of the monarchy. Besides the barons of his own party, and several ecclesiastics, who were not immediate tenants of the crown; he ordered returns to be made of two knights from each shire, and what is more remarkable, of deputies from the boroughs, an order of men, which i Rymer, vol. i. p. 798. Chron. Dunft. vol. i. p. 373.

House of commons.

In former ages had always been regarded as too mean to C HAP. enjoy a place in the national councils k. This period is commonly esteemed the epoch of the house of commons in England; and it is certainly the first time that historians speak of any representatives sent to parliament by the boroughs. In all the general accounts given in preceding times of those affemblies, the prelates and barons only are mentioned as the constituent members; and even in the most particular narratives delivered of parliamentary transactions, as in the trial of Thomas a Becket, where the events of each day, and almost of each hour, are carefully recorded by contemporary authors 1, there is not, throughout the whole, the least appearance of a house of commons. But though that house derived its existence from so precarious and even so invidious an origin as Leicester's usurpation, it soon proved, when summoned by the legal princes, one of the most useful, and, in procels of time, one of the most powerful members of the national constitution; and gradually rescued the kingdom from ariftocratical as well as from regal tyranny. But Leicester's policy, if we must ascribe to him so great a bleffing, only forwarded by some years an institution; for which the general state of things had already prepared the nation; and it is otherwise inconceivable, that a plant, fet by so inauspicious a hand, could have attained to fo vigorous a growth, and have flourished in the midit of fuch tempelts and convulfions. The feudal fystem, with which the liberty, much more the power of the commons, was totally incompatible, began gradually to decline; and both the king and the commonalty, who felt its inconveniencies, contributed to favour this new power, which was more fubmiffive than the barons to the regular authority of the crown, and at the fame time afforded protection to the inferior orders of the flate:

Hoveden, &cc.

k Rymer, vol. i. p. 802. 1 Fitz-Stephen, Hist. Quadrip.

£265.

CHAP. LEICESTER, having thus affembled a parliament of his own model, and truffing to the attachment of the populace of London, feized the opportunity of crushing his rivals among the powerful barons. Robert de Ferrars, earl of Derby, was accused in the king's name, seized. and committed to custody, without being brought to any legal trial m. John Gifford, menaced with the fame fate. fled from London, and took shelter in the borders of Wales. Even the earl of Glocester, whose power and influence had fo much contributed to the fuccess of the barons, but who of late was extremely difgusted with Leicester's arbitrary conduct, found himself in danger from the prevailing authority of his ancient confederate: and he retired from parliament ". This known diffension gave courage to all Leicester's enemies and to the king's friends; who were now fure of protection from fo potent a leader. Though Roger Mortimer, Hamon L'Estrange, and other powerful marchers of Wales, had been obliged to leave the kingdom, their authority still remained over the territories subjected to their jurisdiction; and there were many others who were disposed to give disturbance to the new government. The animofities, inseparable from the feudal aristocracy, broke out with fresh violence. and threatened the kingdom with new convultions and diforders.

THE earl of Leicester, surrounded with these difficulties, embraced a measure, from which he hoped to reap fome prefent advantages, but which proved in the end the fource of all his future calamities. The active and intrepid prince Edward had languished in prison ever fince the fatal battle of Lewes; and as he was extremely popular in the kingdom, there arose a general defire of feeing him again restored to liberty . Leicester finding.

m Chron. T. Wykes, p. 66. Ann. Waverl. p. 216. n M. Paris, p. 671. Ann. Waverl. p. 211. o Knyghton, p. 2451. that that he could with difficulty oppose the concurring wishes C H A P. of the nation, stipulated with the prince, that, in return, he should order his adherents to deliver up to the barons, all their castles, particularly those on the borders of Wales; and should swear neither to depart the kingdom during three years, nor introduce into it any foreign forces P. The king took an oath to the same effect, and he also passed a charter, in which he confirmed the agreement or Mife of Lewes; and even permitted his subjects to rife in arms against him, if he should ever attempt to infringe it 9. So little care did Leicester take, though he constantly made use of the authority of this captive prince. to preserve to him any appearance of royalty or kingly prerogatives!

In consequence of this treaty, prince Edward was brought into Westminster-hall, and was declared free by 11th March. the barons: But instead of really recovering his liberty, as he had vainly expected, he found, that the whole transaction was a fraud on the part of Leicester; that he himself still continued a prisoner at large, and was guarded by the emissaries of that nobleman; and that, while the faction reaped all the benefit from the performance of his part of the treaty, care was taken that he should enjoy no advantage by it. As Glocester, on his supture with the barons, had retired for fafety to his estates on the borders of Wales; Leicester followed him with an army to Hereford , continued still to menace and negotiate, and that he might add authority to his cause, he carried both the king and prince along with him. The earl of Glocester here concerted with young Edward the manner of that prince's escape. He found means to convey to him a horse of extraordinary swiftness; and appointed Roger Mortimer, who had returned to receive the prince, and to guard him to a place of fafety. Edward pretended to take the air with some of Leicester's retinue, who were his guards; and making matches between their horses, after he thought he had tired and blown them sufficiently, he suddenly mounted Glocester's horse, and called to his attendants, that he had long enough enjoyed the pleasure of their company, and now bid them adieu. They followed him for some time, without being able to overtake him; and the appearance of Mortimer with his company put an end to their pursuit.

9 Blackiston's Mag. Charta. Chron. P Ann. Waverl. p. 216. r Chron. T. Wykes, p. 67. Ann. Waverl. Dunft. vol. i. p. 378. p. 218. W. Heming. p. 585. Chron. Dunft, vol. i. p. 383, 384.

THE royalists, secretly prepared for this event, immediately flew to arms; and the joy of this gallant prince's deliverance, the oppressions under which the nation laboured, the expectation of a new scene of affairs, and the countenance of the earl of Glocester, procured Edward an army which Leicester was utterly unable to withstand. This nobleman found himself in a remote quarter of the kingdom; furrounded by his enemies; barred from all communication with his friends by the Severne, whose bridges Edward had broken down; and obliged to fight the cause of his party under these multiplied disadvantages. In this extremity he wrote to his fon, Simon de Montfort, to haften from London with an army for his relief; and Simon had advanced to Kenilworth with that view, where, fancying that all Edward's force and attention were directed against his father, he lay fecure and unguarded. But the prince, making a fudden and forced march, furprized him in his camp, dispersed his army, and took the earl of Oxford, and many other noblemen prisoners, almost without refistance. Leicester, ignorant of his fon's fate, passed the Severne in boats during Edward's absence, and lay at Evesham, in expectation of being every hour joined by his friends from London: When the prince, who availed himself of every favourable moment, appeared in the field before C H A P. him. Edward made a body of his troops advance from the road which led to Kenilworth, and ordered them to 1265.

Battle of carry the banners taken from Simon's army; while he Everham, himself, making a circuit with the rest of his forces, and death purposed to attack the enemy on the other quarter. Lei-4th August. cefter was long deceived by this ftratagem, and took one division of Edward's army for his friends; but at last, perceiving his miftake, and observing the great superiority and excellent disposition of the royalists, he exclaimed, that they had learned from him the art of war; adding, " The Lord have mercy on our fouls, for I fee " our bodies are the prince's." The battle immediately began, though on very unequal terms. Leicester's army, by living in the mountains of Wales without bread, which was not then much used among the inhabitants, had been extremely weakened by fickness and desertion, and was foon broken by the victorious royalists; while his Welsh allies, accustomed only to a desultory kind of war, immediately took to flight, and were purfued with great flaughter. Leicester himself, asking for quarter, was flain in the heat of the action, with his eldeft fon Henry, Hugh le Despenser, and about one hundred and fixty nights, and many other gentlemen of his party. The old king had been purposely placed by the rebels in the front of the battle; and being clad in armour, and thereby not known by his friends, he received a wound, and was in danger of his life: But crying out, I am Henry of Winchester, your king, he was faved; and put in a place of fafety by his fon, who flew to his refcue.

THE violence, ingratitude, tyranny, rapacity and treachery of the earl of Leicester, gave a very bad idea of his moral character, and make us regard his death as the most fortunate event, which, in this conjuncture, could have happened to the English nation: Yet must we allow

P 4

C H A P. allow the man to have possessed great abilities, and the appearance of great virtues, who, though a stranger, could, at a time when firangers were the most odious, and the most universally decried, have acquired so extensive an interest in the kingdom, and have so nearly paved his way to the throne itself. His military capacity, and his political craft, were equally eminent: He poffeffed the talents both of governing men and conducting business: And though his ambition was boundless, it seems neither to have exceeded his courage nor his genius; and he had the happiness of making the low populace, as well as the haughty barons, co-operate towards the fuccess of his felfish and dangerous purposes. A prince of greater abilities and vigour than Henry might have directed the talents of this nobleman either to the exaltation of his throne, or to the good of his people: But the advantages given to Leicester, by the weak and variable administration of the king, brought on the ruin of royal authority. and produced great confusions in the kingdom, which however in the end preferved and extremely improved national liberty, and the constitution. His popularity, even after his death, continued fo great, that, though he was excommunicated by Rome, the people believed him to be a faint; and many miracles were faid to be wrought upon his tomb s.

Settlement of the government. The victory of Evesham, with the death of Leicester, proved decisive in favour of the royalists, and made an equal, though an opposite impression on friends and enemies, in every part of England. The king of the Romans recovered his liberty: The other prisoners of the royal party were not only freed, but courted, by their keepers: Fitz-Richard, the seditious mayor of London, who had marked out forty of the most wealthy citizens for slaughter, immediately stopped his hand on receiving intelligence of this great event: And almost all the castles, C H A P. garrifoned by the barons, haftened to make their fubmiffions, and to open their gates to the king. The ife of Axholme alone, and that of Ely, trufting to the ftrength of their fituation, ventured to make refistance; but were at last reduced, as well as the castle of Dover, by the valour and activity of prince Edward t. Adam de Gourdon, a courageous baron, maintained himfelf during fome time in the forests of Hampshire, committed depredations in the neighbourhood, and obliged the prince to lead a body of troops into that country against him. Edward attacked the camp of the rebels; and being transported by the ardour of battle, leaped over the trench with a few followers, and encountered Gourdon in fingle com-· bat. The victory was long disputed between these valiant combatants; but ended at last in the prince's favour, who wounded his antagonist, threw him from his horse, and took him prisoner. He not only gave him his life; but introduced him that very night to the queen at Guilford, procured him his pardon, restored him to his estate, received him into favour, and was ever after faithfully

S Chron, de Mailr. p. 232.

1264.

1266.

A TOTAL victory of the fovereign over so extensive a rebellion commonly produces a revolution of government, and strengthens, as well as enlarges, for some time, the prerogatives of the crown: Yet no facrifices of national liberty were made on this occasion; the Great Charter remained still inviolate; and the king, sensible that his own barons, by whose affistance alone he had prevailed, were no less jealous of their independance than the other party, feems thenceforth to have more carefully abstained from all those exertions of power, which had afforded so plausible a pretence to the rebels. The clemency of this victory is also remarkable: No blood was shed on the

* M. Paris, p. 676. W. Heming. p. 588.

ferved by him ".

u M. Paris, p. 675.

scaffold:

were carried into execution: And though a parliament, affembled at Winchester, attainted all those, who had borne arms against the king, easy compositions were made with them for their lands w; and the highest sum, levied on the most obnoxious offenders, exceeded not sive years rent of their estate. Even the earl of Derby, who again rebelled, after having been pardoned and restored to his fortune, was obliged to pay only seven years' rent, and was a second time restored. The mild disposition of the king, and the prudence of the prince, tempered the insolence of victory, and gradually restored order to the several members of the state, disjointed by so long a continuance of civil wars and commotions.

THE city of London, which had carried farthest the rage and animofity against the king, and which seemed determined to fland upon its defence after almost all the kingdom had submitted, was, after some interval, restored to most of its liberties and privileges; and Fitz-Richard, the mayor, who had been guilty of fo much illegal violence, was only punished by fine and imprisonment. The countefs of Leicester, the king's sister, who had been extremely forward in all attacks on the royal family, was dismissed the kingdom with her two fons, Simon and Guy, who proved very ungrateful for this lenity. Five years afterwards, they affaffinated, at Viterbo in Italy, their cousin Henry d'Allmaine, who at that very time was endeavouring to make their peace with the king; and by taking fanctuary in the church of the Francifeans, they escaped the punishment due to so great an enormity x.

THE merits of the earl of Glocester, after he returned to his allegiance, had been so great, in restoring the

^{*} M. Paris, p. 675.

* Rymer, vol. i. p. 879. vol. ii. p. 4, 5.
Chron, T. Wykes, p. 94.

W. Heming, p. 589. Trivet, p. 240.

Drince

prince to his liberty, and affifting him in his victories C H A P. against the rebellious barons, that it was almost imposfible to content him in his demands; and his youth and temerity, as well as his great power, tempted him, on fome new difgust, to raise again the flames of rebellion in the kingdom. The mutinous populace of London, at his infligation, took to arms; and the prince was obliged to levy an army of 30,000 men, in order to suppress them. Even this fecond rebellion did not provoke the king to any act of cruelty; and the earl of Glocester himself escaped with total impunity. He was only obliged to enter into a bond of 20,000 marks, that he should never again be guilty of rebellion: A strange method of enforcing the laws, and a proof of the dangerous independance of the barons in those ages! These potent nobles were, from the danger of the precedent, averse to the execution of the laws of forfeiture and felony against any of their fellows; though they could not with a good grace refuse to concur in obliging them to fulfil any voluntary contract and engagement, into which they had entered.

THE prince finding the flate of the kingdom tolerably composed, was seduced, by his avidity for glory, and by the prejudices of the age, as well as by the earnest solicitations of the king of France, to undertake an expedition against the infidels in the Holy Land, and he endeavoured previously to settle the state in such a manner, as to dread no bad effects from his absence. As the formidable power and turbulent disposition of the earl of Glocester gave him apprehensions, he infisted on carrying him along with him, in consequence of a vow, which that nobleman had made to undertake the fame voyage: In the mean time, he obliged him to refign fome 1270.

C H A P. of his castles, and to enter into a new bond not to disturb the peace of the kingdom 2. He failed from England with an army; and arrived in Lewis's camp before Tu-1270. nis in Africa, where he found that monarch already dead, from the intemperance of the climate and the fatigues of his enterprize. The great, if not only weakness of this prince in his government was the imprudent paffion for crufades; but it was this zeal chiefly that procured him from the clergy the title of St. Lewis, by which he is known in the French history; and if that appellation had not been so extremely prostituted, as to become rather a term of reproach, he feems, by his uniform probity and goodness, as well as his piety, to have fully merited the title. He was fucceeded by his fon, Philip, denominated the Hardy; a prince of some merit, though much inferior to that of his father.

PRINCE Edward, not discouraged by this event, con-EZYE. tinued his voyage to the Holy Land, where he fignalized himself by acts of valour: Revived the glory of the English name in those parts: And struck such terror into the Saracens, that they employed an affaffin to murder him, who wounded him in the arm, but perished in the attempt a. Meanwhile, his absence from England was attended with many of those pernicious consequences, which had been dreaded from it. The laws were not executed: The barons oppressed the common people with impunity b: They gave shelter on their estates to bands of robbers, whom they employed in committing ravages on the estates of their enemies: The populace of London returned to their usual licentiousness: And the old king, unequal to the burthen of public affairs, called aloud for his gallant fon to return c, and to affift him in fwaving that scepter, which was ready to drop from his C H A P. feeble and irrefolute hands. At last, overcome by the cares of government, and the infirmities of age, he visibly declined, and he expired at St. Edmondsbury in the 64th year of his age, and 56th of his reign; the longest reign that is to be met with in the English annals. His brother, the king of the Romans (for he never attained the title of emperor) died about seven months before him.

2 Chron. T. Wykes, p. 90. a M. Paris, p. 678, 679. W. Heming. p. 520. b Chron. Dunft, vol. i. p. 404. c Rymer, vol. i. p. 869. M. Paris, p. 678.

1271. 1272. 16th Nova

THE most obvious circumstance of Henry's character is and charachis incapacity for government, which rendered him as king. much a prisoner in the hands of his own ministers and favourites, and as little at his own disposal, as when detained a captive in the hands of his enemies. From this fource, rather than from infincerity or treachery, arose his negligence in observing his promises; and he was too easily induced, for the sake of present convenience, to facrifice the lasting advantages arising from the trust and confidence of his people. Hence too were derived his profusion to favourites, his attachment to strangers, the variableness of his conduct, his hasty refentments, and his fudden forgiveness and return of affection. Instead of reducing the dangerous power of his nobles, by obliging them to observe the laws towards their inferiors, and fetting them the falutary example in his own government; he was feduced to imitate their conduct, and to make his arbitrary will, or rather that of his ministers, the rule of his actions. Instead of accommodating himself, by a strict frugality, to the embarrassed fituation in which his revenue had been left, by the military expeditions of his uncle, the diffipations of his father, and the usurpations of the barons; he was tempted to levy money by irregular exactions, which, without enriching himself, impoverished, at least disgusted his people. Of all men, nature seemed least to have fitted him for being a tyrant; yet are there instances of oppres-

fion

C H A P. fion in his reign, which, though derived from the preces dents, left him by his predecessors, had been carefully guarded against by the Great Charter, and are incon-1272. fiftent with all rules of good government. And on the whole we may fay, that greater abilities, with his good dispositions, would have prevented him from falling into his faults; or with worfe dispositions, would have enabled him to maintain and defend them.

> This prince was noted for his piety and devotion, and his regular attendance on public worship; and a faying of his on that head is much celebrated by ancient writers. He was engaged in a dispute with Lewis IX. of France, concerning the preference between fermons and maffes: He maintained the superiority of the latter, and affirmed, that he would rather have one hour's converfation with a friend, than hear twenty the most elaborate discourses, pronounced in his praise .

> HENRY left two fons, Edward his fuccessor, and Edmond earl of Lancaster; and two daughters, Margaret queen of Scotland, and Beatrix dutchess of Britanny. He had five other children, who died in their infancy.

Miscellanereign.

THE following are the most remarkable laws enacted ous transactions of this during this reign. There had been great disputes between the civil and ecclefiaftical courts concerning baftardy. The common law had deemed all those to be bastards who were born before wedlock: By the canon law they were legitimate: And when any dispute of inheritance arose, it had formerly been usual for the civil courts to issue writs to the spiritual, directing them to enquire into the legitimacy of the person. The bishop always returned an answer agreeable to the canon law, though contrary to the municipal law of the kingdom. For this reason, the civil courts had changed the terms of their writ; and instead of requiring the spiritual courts to make inquisition

e Walfing. Edw. I. p. 43.

concerning

concerning the legitimacy of the person, they only pro- CHAP. posed the simple question of fact, whether he were born before or after wedlock. The prelates complained of this practice to the parliament affembled at Merton in the twentieth of this king, and defired that the municipal law might be rendered conformable to the canon: But received from all the nobility the memorable reply, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutare, We will not change the laws of England f.

AFTER the civil wars, the parliament fummoned at Marlebridge, gave their approbation to most of the ordinances, which had been established by the reforming barons, and which, though advantageous to the fecurity of the people, had not received the fanction of a legal authority. Among other laws, it was there enacted, that all appeals from the courts of inferior lords should be carried directly to the king's courts, without passing through the courts of the lords immediately superior s. It was ordained, that money should bear no interest during the minority of the debtor h. This law was reasonable, as the estates of minors were always in the hands of their lords, and the debtors could not pay interest where they had no revenue. The charter of king John had granted this indulgence: It was omitted in that of Henry III. for what reason is not known; but it was renewed by the statute of Marlebridge. Most of the other articles of this statute are calculated to restrain the oppressions of sheriffs, and the violence and iniquities committed in distraining cattle and other goods. Cattle and the instruments of husbandry formed at that time the chief riches of the people.

In the 35th year of this king an affize was fixed of bread, the price of which was fettled, according to the f Statute of Merton, chap. 9.

g Statute of Marlb, chap, 20.

h Ibid, chap, 16.

CHAP. different prices of corn, from one shilling a quarter to feven shillings and fixpence i, money of that age. These great variations are alone a proof of bad tillage k: Yet did the prices often rife much higher, than any taken notice of by the statute. The chronicle of Dunstable tells us, that in this reign, wheat was once fold for a mark, nay for a pound a quarter; that is, three pounds of our present money 1. The same law affords us a proof of the little communication between the parts of the kingdom, from the very different prices which the same commodity bore at the same time. A brewer, says the statute, may fell two gallons of ale for a penny in cities, and three or four gallons for the fame price in the country. At prefent, fuch commodities, by the great confumption of the people, and the great stocks of the brewers, are rather cheapest in cities. The Chronicle above-mentioned observes, that wheat one year was fold in many places for eight shillings a quarter, but never rose in Dunstable above a crown.

THOUGH commerce was still very low, it feems rather to have encreased since the Conquest; at least, if we may judge of the increase of money by the price of corn. The medium between the highest and lowest prices of wheat, affigned by the statute, is four shillings and three pence a quarter, that is, twelve shillings and nine pence of our present money. This is near half of the middling price in our time. Yet the middling price of cattle, fo late as the reign of king Richard, we found to be above eight, near ten times lower than the present. Is not this the true inference, from comparing these facts, that, in all

uncivilized

k We learn from Cicero's crations i Statutes at large, p. 6. against Verres, lib. iii. cap. 84. 92. that the price of corn in Sicily was, during the practorship of Sacerdos, five Denarii a Modius; during that of Verres, which immediately succeeded, only two Sesterces: That is, ten times lower; a prefumption, or rather a proof, of the very bad state of tillage ih ancient times. 1 So alfo Knyghton, p. 2444.

uncivilized nations, cattle, which propagate of themselves, C H A P. bear always a lower price than corn, which requires more art and flock to render it plentiful, than those nations are possessed of? It is to be remarked, that Henry's affize of corn was copied from a preceding affize established by king John; confequently, the prices which we have here compared of corn and cattle may be looked on as contemporary; and they were drawn, not from one particular year, but from an estimation of the middling prices for a feries of years. It is true, the prices, affigned by the affize of Richard, were meant as a standard for the accompts of sheriffs and escheators; and as considerable profits were allowed to these ministers, we may naturally suppose, that the common value of cattle was somewhat higher: Yet still, fo great a difference between the prices of corn and cattle as that of four to one, compared to the present rates, affords important reflections concerning the very different state of industry and tillage in the two periods.

INTEREST had in that age mounted to an enormous height, as might be expected from the barbarism of the times and men's ignorance of commerce. Inflances occur of fifty per cent. payed for money m. There is an edict of Philip Augustus near this period, limiting the Jews in France to 48 per cent." Such profits tempted the Tews to remain in the kingdom, notwithstanding the grievous oppressions, to which, from the prevalent bigotry and rapine of the age, they were continually exposed. It is easy to imagine how precarious their state must have been under an indigent prince, somewhat restrained in his tyranny over his native subjects, but who possessed an unlimited authority over the Jews, the fole proprietors of money in the kingdom, and hated on account of their riches, their religion, and their usury: Yet will our ideas fcarcely come up to the extortions which in fact we find n Bruffel Traité des Fiefs, vol. i. p. 576. m M. Paris, p. 586.

C H A P. to have been practifed upon them. In the year 1241, _20,000 marks were exacted from them o: Two years after, money was again extorted; and one Jew alone, Aaron of York, was obliged to pay above 4000 marks P: In 1250, Henry renewed his oppressions; and the same Aaron was condemned to pay him 30,000 marks upon an accufation of forgery q: The high penalty imposed upon him, and which, it feems, he was thought able to pay, is rather a prefumption of his innocence than of his guilt. In 1255, the king demanded 8000 marks from the Jews, and threatened to hang them, if they refused compliance. They now loft all patience, and defired leave to retire with their effects out of the kingdom. But the king replied: " How can I remedy the oppressions you complain " of? I am myself a beggar. I am spoiled, I am stripped of all my revenues: I owe above 200,000 marks; " and if I had faid 300,000, I should not exceed the truth: I am obliged to pay my fon, prince Edward, 66 15,000 marks a year: I have not a farthing; and I " must have money, from any hand, from any quarter, or by any means." He then delivered over the Jews to the earl of Cornwal, that those whom the one brother had flead, the other might embowel, to make use of the words of the historian . King John, his father, once demanded 1,0000 marks from a Jew of Briftol; and on his refusal, ordered one of his teeth to be drawn every day till he should comply. The Jew lost seven teeth; and then paid the fum required of him s. One talliage laid upon the Jews in 1243 amounted to 60,000 marks t: a fum equal to the whole yearly revenue of the crown.

To give a better pretence for extortions, the improbable and absurd accusation, which has been at different times advanced against that nation, was revived in England, o M. Paris, p. 372.

P Ibid. p. 410.

⁹ Ibid. p. 525. * Madox, p. 152.

¹ Ibid. p. 606.

that they had crucified a child in derifion of the fufferings C H A P. of Christ. Eighteen of them were hanged at once for this crime ": Though it is no wife credible, that even the antipathy born them by the Christians, and the oppreffions under which they laboured, would ever have pushed them to be guilty of that dangerous enormity. But it is natural to imagine, that a race, exposed to such infults and indignities both from king and people, and who had fo uncertain an enjoyment of their riches, would carry usury to the utmost extremity, and by their great profits make themselves some compensation for their continual perils.

Though these acts of violence against the Jews proceeded much from bigotry, they were still more derived from avidity and rapine. So far from defiring in that age to convert them, it was enacted by law in France, that, if any Jew embraced Christianity, he forfeited all his goods, without exception, to the king or his fuperior lord. These plunderers were careful, lest the profits, accruing from their dominion over that unhappy race, should be diminished by their conversion w.

COMMERCE must be in a wretched condition, where interest was so high, and where the sole proprietors of money employed it in usury only, and were exposed to fuch extortion and injustice. But the bad police of the country was another obstacle to improvements; and rendered all communication dangerous, and all property precarious. The Chronicle of Dunstable fays x, that men were never fecure in their houses, and that whole villages were often plundered by bands of robbers, though no civil wars at that time prevailed in the kingdom. In 1249, fome years before the infurrection of the barons, two merchants of Brabant came to the king at Winchester, w Bruffel, vol. i. p. 622. Du Cange verbo u M. Paris, p. 613. x Vol. i. p. 155. Judai.

C H A P and told him, that they had been spoiled of all their goods by certain robbers, whom they knew, because they faw their faces every day in his court; that like practices prevailed all over England, and travellers were continually exposed to the danger of being robbed, bound, wounded, and murdered; that these crimes escaped with impunity, because the ministers of justice themselves were in a confederacy with the robbers; and that they, for their part, instead of bringing matters to a fruitless trial by law, were willing, though merchants, to decide their cause with the robbers by arms and a duel. The king, provoked at these abuses, ordered a jury to be inclosed, and to try the robbers: The jury, though confifting of twelve men of property in Hampshire, were found to be also in a confederacy with the felons, and acquitted them. Henry in a rage committed the jury to prison, threatened them with fevere punishment, and ordered a new jury to be inclosed, who, dreading the fate of their fellows, at last found a verdict against the criminals. Many of the king's ownhousehold were discovered to have participated in the guilt; and they faid for their excuse, that they received no wages from him, and were obliged to rob for a maintenance y. Knights and esquires, says the Dictum of Kenelworth, who were robbers, if they have no land, shall pay the half of their goods, and find sufficient security to keep henceforth the peace of the kingdom. Such were the manners of the times!

> ONE can the less repine, during the prevalence of such manners, at the frauds and forgeries of the clergy; as it gives less disturbance to society, to take men's money from them with their own confent, though by deceits and lies, than to ravish it by open force and violence. During this reign, the papal power was at its fummit, and was even beginning infenfibly to decline, by reason of the im-CHAP. measurable avarice and extortions of the court of Rome, which difgusted the clergy as well as laity, in every kingdom of Europe. England itself, though funk in the deepest abyss of ignorance and superstition, had seriously entertained thoughts of shaking off the papal yoke z; and the Roman pontiff was obliged to think of new expedients for rivetting it faster upon the Christian world. For this purpose, Gregory IX. published his decretals*, which are a collection of forgeries, favourable to the court of Rome, and confift of the supposed decrees of popes in the first centuries. But these forgeries are so gross, and confound fo palpably all language, hiftory, chronology, and antiquities; matters more stubborn than any speculative truths whatfoever; that even that church, which is not startled at the most monstrous contradictions and absurdities, has been obliged to abandon them to the critics. But in the dark period of the thirteenth century, they passed for undifputed and authentic; and men, entangled in the mazes of this false literature, joined to the philosophy, equally false, of the times, had nothing wherewithal to defend themselves, but some small remains of common fense, which passed for profaneness and impiety, and the indelible regard to felf-interest, which, as it was the fole motive in the priefts for framing these impostures. ferved also, in some degree, to protect the laity against them.

ANOTHER expedient, devised by the church of Rome, in this period, for fecuring her power, was the institution of new religious orders, chiefly the Dominicans and Franciscans, who proceeded with all the zeal and success that attend novelties; were better qualified to gain the populace than the old orders, now become rich and ina Trivet, p. 191.

M. Paris, p. 421.

CHAP. dolent; maintained a perpetual rivalship with each other in promoting their gainful superstitions; and acquired a great dominion over the minds, and confequently over the purses of men, by pretending a desire of poverty and a contempt for riches. The quarrels which arose between these orders, lying still under the controll of the fovereign pontiff, never disturbed the peace of the church, and ferved only as a spur to their industry in promoting the common cause; and though the Dominicans lost fome popularity by their denial of the immaculate conception, a point in which they unwarily engaged too far to be able to recede with honour, they counterbalanced this difadvantage by acquiring more folid establishments. by gaining the confidence of kings and princes, and by exercifing the jurisdiction affigned them, of ultimate judges and punishers of herefy. Thus, the feveral orders of monks became a kind of regular troops or garrifons of the Romish church; and though the temporal interests of fociety, still more the cause of true piety, were hurt, by their various devices to captivate the populace, they proved the chief supports of that mighty fabric of superfition, and, till the revival of true learning, fecured it from any dangerous invation.

THE trial by ordeal was abolished in this reign by order of council: A faint mark of improvement in the age b.

HENRY granted a charter to the town of Newcastle, in which he gave the inhabitants a licence to dig coal. This is the first mention of coal in England.

WE learn from Madox c, that this king gave at one time 100 shillings to master Henry, his poet: Also the same year he orders this poet ten pounds.

€ Page 268.

Rymer, vol. i. p. 228. Spelman, p. 326.

IT appears from Selden, that in the 47th of this reign C H A P. a hundred and fifty temporal, and fifty spiritual barons were summoned to perform the service, due by their tenures d. In the 35th of the subsequent reign eighty-fix temporal barons, twenty bishops, and forty-eight abbots, were summoned to a parliament convened at Carlisle.

d Titles of honour, part 2. chap. 3. vol. i. p. 151.

e Parliamentary Hist.

CHAP. XIII.

EDWARD I.

Civil administration of the king—Conquest of Wales—Affairs of Scotland—Competitors for the crown of Scotland—Reference to Edward—Homage of Scotland—Award of Edward in favour of Baliol—War with France—Digression concerning the constitution of parliament—War with Scotland—Scotland subdued—War with France—Dissensions with the clergy—Arbitrary measures—Peace with France—Arbitrary measures—Peace with France—Revolt of Scotland—That kingdom again subdued—again revolts—is again subdued—Robert Bruce—Third revolt of Scotland—Death and character of the king—Miscellaneous transactions of this reign.

HE English were as yet so little enured to obedience under a regular government, that the death of almost every king, since the conquest, had been attended with disorders; and the council, reslecting on the recent civil wars, and on the animosities which naturally remain after these great convulsions, had reason to apprehend dangerous consequences from the absence of the son and successor of Henry. They therefore hastened to proclaim prince Edward, to swear allegiance to him, and to summon the states of the kingdom, in order to provide for the public peace in this important conjunctures. Walter

f Rymer, wol. ii. p. 1. Walfing. p. 43. Trivet, p. 239.

Giffard, archbishop of York, the earl of Cornwal, fon of C H A P. Richard, king of the Romans, and the earl of Glocester, were appointed guardians of the realm, and proceeded peaceably to the exercise of their authority, without either meeting with opposition from any of the people, or being disturbed with emulation and faction among themselves. The high character acquired by Edward during the late commotions, his military genius, his fuccess in subduing the rebels, his moderation in fettling the kingdom, had procured him great esteem, mixed with affection, among all orders of-men; and no one could reasonably entertain hopes of making any advantage of his absence, or of raifing diffurbance in the nation. The earl of Glocester himself, whose great power and turbulent spirit had excited most jealoufy, was forward to give proofs of his allegiance; and the other malcontents, being deftitute of a leader, were obliged to remain in submission to the government.

PRINCE Edward had reached Sicily in his return from the Holy Land, when he received intelligence of the death of his father; and he discovered a deep concern on the occasion. At the same time he learned the death of an infant fon, John, whom his princess, Eleanor of Castile, had born him at Acre in Palestine, and as he appeared much less affected with that misfortune, the king of Sicily expressed a surprize at this difference of fentiment: But was told by Edward, that the death of a fon was a loss which he might hope to repair; the death of a father was a loss irreparable s.

EDWARD proceeded homeward; but as he foon learned the quiet settlement of the kingdom, he was in no hurry to take possession of the throne, but spent near a year in France, before he made his appearance in England. In his passage by Chalons in Burgundy, he was challenged

C H A P. by the prince of the country to a tournament which he was preparing; and as Edward excelled in those martial and dangerous exercises, the true image of war, he declined not the opportunity of acquiring honour in that great affembly of the neighbouring nobles. But the image of war was here unfortunately turned into the thing itself. Edward and his retinue were so successful in the jousts, that the French knights, provoked at their superiority, made a serious attack upon them, which was repulsed, and much blood was idly shed in the quarrel b. This rencounter received the name of the petty battle of Chalons.

EDWARD went from Chalons to Paris, and did homage to Philip for the dominions which he held in France 1.

1274. He thence returned to Guienne, and settled that province, which was in some confusion. He made his journey to London through France; in his passage he accommodated at Montreuil a difference with Margaret, countess of Flanders, heiress of that territory 1/2; he was received with joyful acclamations by his people, and was solemnly crowned at Westminster by Robert, archbishop of Canterbury.

Civil administration of the king.

THE king immediately applied himself to the re-establishment of his kingdom, and to the correcting of those disorders, which the civil commotions and the loose administration of his father had introduced into every part of government. The plan of his policy was equally generous and prudent. He considered the great barons both as the immediate rivals of the crown, and oppressors of the people; and he purposed, by an exact distribution of justice, and a rigid execution of the laws, to give at once protection to the inserior orders of the state, and to diminish the arbitrary power of the great, on which their

h Walfing, p. 44. Trivet, p. 24r. M. West. p. 402.

Walfing, p. 45. Rymer, vol. ii. p. 32, 33.

dangerous authority was chiefly founded. Making it a C H A P. rule in his own conduct to observe, except on extraordinary occasions, the privileges fecured to them by the Great Charter, he acquired a right to infift upon their observance of the same charter towards their vassals and inferiors; and he made the crown be regarded by all the gentry and commonalty of the kingdom, as the fountain of justice, and the general asylum against oppresfion. Besides enacting several useful statutes, in a parliament which he fummoned at Westminster, he took care 16th Feb. to inspect the conduct of all his magistrates and judges, to displace such as were either negligent or corrupt, to provide them with fufficient force for the execution of justice, to extirpate all bands and confederacies of robbers. and to reprefs those more filent robberies, which were committed either by the power of the nobles, or under the countenance of public authority. By this rigid administration, the face of the kingdom was foon changed; and order and justice took place of violence and oppresfion: But amidst the excellent institutions and publicspirited plans of Edward, there still appears somewhat both of the feverity of his personal character and of the prejudices of the times.

1274-

As the various kinds of malefactors, the murderers, robbers, incendiaries, ravishers, and plunderers, had become so numerous and powerful, that the ordinary ministers of justice, especially in the western counties, were afraid to execute the laws against them, the king found it necessary to provide an extraordinary remedy for the evil; and he erected a new tribunal, which, however useful, would have been deemed, in times of more regular liberty, a great stretch of illegal and arbitrary power. It confisted of commissioners, who were empowered to enquire into disorders and crimes of all kinds, and to inflict the proper punishments upon them. The officers, charged with throughout the counties of England most infested with this evil, and carried terror into all those parts of the kingdom. In their zeal to punish crimes, they did not sufficiently distinguish between the innocent and guilty; the smallest suspecion became a ground of accusation and trial; the slightest evidence was received against criminals; prisons were crowded with malesactors, real or pretended; severe sines were levied for small offences; and the king, though his exhausted exchequer was supplied by this expedient, sound it necessary to stop the course of so great rigour, and after terrifying and dissipating by this tribunal the gangs of disorderly people in England, he prudently annulled the commission is and never afterwards renewed it.

Among the various disorders, to which the kingdom was subject, no one was more universally complained of than the adulteration of the coin; and as this crime required more art than the English of that age, who chiefly employed force and violence in their iniquities, were poffessed of, the imputation fell upon the Jews m. Edward also seems to have indulged a strong prepossession against that nation; and this ill-judged zeal for Christianity being naturally augmented by an expedition to the Holy Land, he let loose the whole rigour of his justice against that unhappy people. Two hundred and eighty of them were hanged at once for this crime in London alone, befides those who suffered in other parts of the kingdom . The houses and lands, (for the Jews had of late ventured to make purchases of that kind) as well as the goods of great multitudes, were fold and conficated: And the m. Walsing, p. 48. Heming, vol. ii. p. 6.

* T. Wykes, p. 107.

¹ Spellman's Gloff. in verbo Trailbasson. But Spellman was either mistaken in placing this commission in the fifth year of the king, or it was renewed in 1305. See Rymer, vol. ii. p. 960. Trivet, p. 338. M. West. p. 450.

king, left it should be suspected that the riches of the CHAP. fufferers were the chief part of their guilt, ordered a moiety of the money, raifed by these confiscations, to be fet apart, and bestowed upon such as were willing to be converted to Christianity. But refentment was more prevalent with them, than any temptation from their poverty; and very few of them could be induced by interest to embrace the religion of their persecutors. The miseries of this people did not here terminate. Though the arbitrary talliages and exactions, levied upon them, had yielded a constant and a considerable revenue to the crown; Edward, prompted by his zeal and his rapacity, refolved fome time after o to purge the kingdom entirely of that hated race, and to feize to himself at once their whole property as the reward of his labour p. He left them only money fufficient to bear their charges into foreign countries, where new perfecutions and extortions awaited them: But the inhabitants of the cinque-ports, imitating the bigotry and avidity of their fovereign, despoiled most of them of this fmall pittance, and even threw many of them into the fea: A crime, for which the king, who was determined to be the fole plunderer in his dominions, inflicted a capital punishment upon them. No less than fifteen thousand Jews were at this time robbed of their effects and banished the kingdom: Very few of that nation have fince lived in England: And as it is impossible for a nation to fubfift without lenders of money, and none will lend without a compensation, the practice of usury, as it was then called, was thenceforth exercised by the English themselves upon their fellow-citizens, or by Lombards and other foreigners. It is very much to be questioned, whether the dealings of these new usurers were equally open and unexceptionable with those of the copies should be made of every bond given to a Jew; one to be put into the hands of a public magisfrate, another into those of a man of credit, and a third to remain with the Jew himself q. But as the canon law, seconded by the municipal, permitted no Christian to take interest, all transactions of this kind must, after the banishment of the Jews, have become more secret and clandestine, and the lender, of consequence, be paid both for the use of his money, and for the infamy and danger which he incurred by lending it.

P Walfing. p. 54. Heming. vol. i. p. 20. o In the year 1290. Trivet, p. 266.

THE great poverty of the crown, though no excuse. was probably the cause of this egregious tyranny exercised against the Jews; but Edward also practifed other more honourable means of remedying that evil. He employed a strict frugality in the management and distribution of his revenue: He engaged the parliament to vote him a fifteenth of all moveables; the pope to grant him the tenth of all ecclefiaftical revenues for three years; and the merchants to confent to a perpetual imposition of half a mark on every fack of wool exported, and a mark on three hundred skins. He also issued commissions to enquire into all encroachments on the royal demesne; into the value of escheats, forseitures, and wardships; and into the means of repairing or improving every branch of the revenuer. The commissioners, in the execution of their office, began to carry matters too far against the nobility, and to question titles to estates which had been transmitted from father to son for several generations. Earl Warrenne, who had done fuch eminent fervice in the late reign, being required to show his titles, drew his sword; and subjoined, that William, the Bastard, had not conquered the kingdom for himfelf alone: His ancestor was a joint adventurer in the enterprize; and he himself was

9 Trivet, p. 128.

r Ann. Waverl. p. 235.

But the active spirit of Edward could not long remain without employment. He foon after undertook an enter-Conquest of Wales. prize more prudent for himfelf, and more advantageous to his people. Lewellyn, prince of Wales, had been deeply engaged with the Mountfort faction; had entered into all their conspiracies against the crown; had frequently fought on their fide; and till the battle of Evesham, so fatal to that party, had employed every expedient to depress the royal cause, and to promote the success of the barons. In the general accommodation, made with the vanguished, Lewellyn had also obtained his pardon; but as he was the most powerful, and therefore the most obnoxious vassal of the crown, he had reason to entertain anxiety about his fituation, and to dread the future effects of resentment and jealousy in the English monarch. For this reason, he determined to provide for his security by maintaining a fecret correspondence with his former associates: and he even made his addresses to a daughter of the earl of Leicester, who was sent to him from beyond fea, but being intercepted in her passage near the isles of Scilly, was detained in the court of England's. This incident encreasing the mutual jealoufy between Edward and Lewellyn, the latter, when required to come to England, and do homage to the new king, scrupled to put himself in the hands of an enemy, defired a safeconduct from Edward, infifted upon having the king's fon and other noblemen delivered to him as hostages, and demanded, that his confort should previously be fet at liberty.

8 Walfing. p. 46, 47. Heming. vol. i. p. 5. Trivet, p. 248.

C H A P. liberty t. The king, having now brought the state to a full fettlement, was not displeased with this occasion of exercifing his authority, and fubduing entirely the prin-1276. cipality of Wales. He refused all Lewellyn's demands. except that of a fafe-conduct; fent him repeated fummons to perform the duty of a vassal; levied an army to reduce him to obedience: obtained a new aid of a fifteenth from parliament; and marched out with certain affurance of fuccess against the enemy. Besides the great disproportion of force between the kingdom and the principality, the circumstances of the two states were entirely reversed: and the fame intestine diffentions, which had formerly weakened England, now prevailed in Wales, and had even taken place in the reigning family. David and Roderic, brothers to Lewellyn, dispossessed of their inheritance by that prince, had been obliged to have recourse to the protection of Edward, and they feconded with all their interest, which was extensive, his attempts to enflave their native country. The Welsh prince had no resource but in the inaccessible situation of his mountains, which had hitherto, through many ages, defended his forefathers against all attempts of the Saxon and Norman conquerors; and he retired among the hills of Snowdun, resolute to defend himself to the last extremity. But Edward, equally vigorous and cautious, entering by the north with a formidable army, pierced into the heart of the country; and having carefully explored every road before him, and fecured every pass behind him, approached the Welsh army in its last retreat. He here avoided the putting to trial the valour of a nation, proud of its ancient independance, and enflamed with animofity against its hereditary enemies; and he trusted to the slow, but fure effects of famine, for reducing that people to subjection. The rude and fimple manners of the natives, as well as the mountainous fituation of their country, had C H A P. made them entirely neglect tillage, and trust to pasturage alone for their fubfiftence: A method of life which had 12770 hitherto fecured them against the irregular attempts of the English, but exposed them to certain ruin, when the conquest of the country was steddily pursued, and prudently planned by Edward. Destitute of magazines, cooped up in a narrow corner, they, as well as their cattle, fuffered all the rigors of famine; and Lewellyn, without being able to strike a stroke for his independance, was at last obliged to submit at discretion, and receive the terms imposed upon him by the victor ". He bound himself to 19th Nov. pay to Edmond 50,000 pounds, as a reparation of damages: to do homage to the crown of England; to permit all the other barons of Wales, except four near Snowdun, to fwear fealty to the same crown; to relinquish the country between Cheshire and the river Conway; to settle on his brother Roderic a thousand marks a year, and on David five hundred; and to deliver ten hostages as security for his future fubmission w.

Rymer, vol. ii. p. 68. Walfing. p. 46. Trivet, p. 247.

EDWARD, on the performance of the other articles. remitted to the prince of Wales the payment of the 50,000 pounds x, which were stipulated by treaty, and which, it is probable the poverty of the country made it absolutely impossible for him to levy. But notwithstanding this indulgence, complaints of iniquities foon arose on the side of the vanquished: The English, insolent on their easy and bloodless victory, oppressed the inhabitants of the districts which were yielded to them: The lords marchers committed with impunity all kinds of violence on their Welfh neighbours: New and more severe terms were imposed on Lewellyn himself; and Edward, when the prince attended him at Worcester, exacted a promise that he would retain

Vol. II.

w Rymer, vol. ii. p. 88. Walfing. p. 47u T. Wykes, p. 105. Trivet, p. 251. T. Wykes, p. 106. x Rymer, p. 92. R

C H A P. no person in his principality who should be obnoxious to the English monarch r. There were other personal infults, which raifed the indignation of the Welsh, and made them determine rather to encounter a force, which they had already experienced to be fo much superior, than to bear oppression from the haughty victors. Prince David, feized with the national spirit, made peace with his brother, and promifed to concur in the defence of public liberty. The Welsh flew to arms; and Edward, not displeased with the occasion of making his conquest final and absolute, assembled all his military tenants, and advanced into Wales with an army, which the inhabitants could not reasonably hope to resist. The situation of the country gave the Welsh at first some advantage over Luke de Tany, one of Edward's captains, who had passed the Menau with a detachment 2: But Lewellyn, being furprized by Mortimer, was defeated and flain in an action, and 2000 of his followers were put to the fword a. David, who succeeded him in the principality, could never collect an army sufficient to face the English; and being chaced from hill to hill, and hunted from one retreat to another, was obliged to conceal himfelf under various difguifes, and was at last betrayed in his lurkingplace to the enemy. Edward fent him in chains to Shrewsbury; and bringing him to a formal trial before all the peers of England, ordered this fovereign prince to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, as a traitor, for defending by arms the liberties of his native country, together with his own hereditary authority b. All the Welsh nobility fubmitted to the conqueror; the laws of England, with the sheriffs and other ministers of justice, were y Dr. Powell's Hift. of Wales, p. 344, 345. z Walfing. p. 50e Heming. vol. i. p. 9. Trivet, p. 258. T. Wykes, p. 110.

² Heming. vol. i. p. 11. Trivet, p. 257. Ann. Waverl. p. 235. b Heming. vol. i. p. 12. Trivet, p. 259. Ann. Waverl. p. 238. T. Wykes, p. 111. M. West. p. 411.

before national antipathies were extinguished, and a thorough union attained between the people, yet this important conquest, which it had required eight hundred years fully to effect, was at last, through the abilities of Edward, completed by the English.

THE king, fensible that nothing kept alive the ideas of military valour and of ancient glory, so much as the traditional poetry of the people, which, affished by the power of music, and the jollity of festivals, made deep impression on the minds of the youth, gathered together all the Welsh bards, and from a barbarous, though not absurd policy, ordered them to be put to death c.

THERE prevails a vulgar story, which, as it well suits the capacity of the monkish writers, is carefully recorded by them: That Edward, assembling the Welsh, promised to give them a prince of unexceptionable manners, a Welshman by birth, and one who could speak no other language. On their acclamations of joy, and promise of obedience, he invested in the principality his second son Edward, then an infant, who had been born at Carnarvon. The death of his eldest son Alsonso, soon after, made young Edward heir of the monarchy: The principality of Wales was fully annexed to the crown; and henceforth gives a title to the eldest son of the kings of England.

THE fettlement of Wales appeared so complete to Edward, that, in less than two years after, he went abroad, in order to make peace between Alphonso, king of Arragon, and Philip the Fair, who had lately succeeded his father Philip the Hardy on the throne of France d. The difference between these two princes had arisen about the

1286

c Sir J. Wynne, p. 15. d Rymer, vol. ii, p. 149, 150. 174.

R 2 kingdom

C H A P. kingdom of Sicily, which the pope, after his hopes from XIII.

England failed him, had bestowed on Charles, brother to St. Lewis, and which was claimed upon other titles, by Peter king of Arragon, father to Alphonso. Edward had powers from both princes to settle the terms of peace, and he succeeded in his endeavours; but as the controversy nowise regards England, we shall not enter into a detail of it. He stayed abroad above three years; and on his return, found many disorders to have prevailed, both from open violence, and from the corruption of justice.

THOMAS CHAMBERLAIN, a gentleman of fome note, had affembled feveral of his affociates at Boston, in Lincolnshire, under pretence of holding a tournament, an exercise practised by the gentry only; but in reality with a view of plundering the rich fair of Boston, and robbing the merchants. To facilitate his purpose, he privately fet fire to the town: and while the inhabitants were employed in quenching the flames, the conspirators broke into the booths, and carried off the goods. Chamberlain himself was detected and hanged; but maintained so steddily the point of honour to his accomplices, that he could not be prevailed on, by offers or promifes, to discover any of them. Many other instances of robbery and violence broke out in all parts of England; though the fingular circumstances attending this conspiracy have made it alone be particularly recorded by historians .

1289.

SECTION A

Bur the corruption of the judges, by which the fountains of justice were poisoned, seemed of still more dangerous consequence. Edward, in order to remedy this prevailing abuse, summoned a parliament, and brought the judges to a trial; where all of them, except two, who were clergymen, were convicted of this flagrant iniquity, were fined, and deposed. The amount of the fines, levied upon them, is alone a fufficient proof of CHAP. their guilt; being above one hundred thousand marks, an immense sum in those days, and sufficient to defray the charges of an expensive war between two great kingdoms. The king afterwards made all the new judges fwear, that they would take no bribes; but his expedient, of deposing and fining the old ones, was the more effectual remedy.

WE now come to give an account of the state of affairs in Scotland, which gave rife to the most interesting transactions of this reign, and of some of the subsequent; though the intercourse of that kingdom with England, either in peace or war, had hitherto produced fo few events of moment, that, to avoid tediousness, we have omitted many of them, and have been very concife in relating the rest. If the Scots had, before this period, any real history, worthy of the name, except what they glean from scattered passages in the English historians, those events, however minute, yet, being the only foreign transactions of the nation, might deserve a place in it.

THOUGH the government of Scotland had been conti-Affairs of nually exposed to those factions and convulsions, which Scotland, are incident to all barbarous, and to many civilized nations; and though the fuccessions of their kings, the only part of their history which deserves any credit, had often been disordered by irregularities and usurpations; the true heir of the royal family had still in the end prevailed, and Alexander III. who had espoused the fifter of Edward. probably inherited, after a period of about eight hundred years, and through a fuccession of males, the scepter of all the Scottish princes, who had governed the nation, fince its first establishment in the island. This prince died in 1286 by a fall from his horse at Kinghorn f, without leaving any male iffue, and without any descend-

C H A P. ant, except Margaret, born of Eric, king of Norway, and of Margaret, daughter of the Scottish monarch. 1289. This princess, commonly called the maid of Norway, though a female, and an infant, and a foreigner, yet being the lawful heir of the kingdom, had, through her grandfather's care, been recognized fucceffor by the states of Scotland 8; and on Alexander's death, the dispositions, which had been previously made against that event, appeared fo just and prudent, that no diforders, as might naturally be apprehended, enfued in the kingdom. Margaret was acknowledged queen of Scotland; five guardians, the bishops of St. Andrews and Glasgow, the earls of Fife and Buchan, and James, steward of Scotland, entered peaceably upon the administration; and the infant princess, under the protection of Edward, her great uncle, and Eric, her father, who exerted themselves on this occasion, seemed firmly seated on the throne of Scotland. The English monarch was naturally led to build mighty projects on this incident; and having lately, by force of arms, brought Wales under subjection, he attempted, by the marriage of Margaret with his eldeft fon Edward, to unite the whole island into one monarchy, and thereby to give it fecurity both against domestic convulfions and foreign invafions. The amity, which had $200. of late prevailed between the two nations, and which, even in former times, had never been interrupted by any violent wars or injuries, facilitated extremely the execution of this project, fo favourable to the happiness and grandeur of both kingdoms; and the states of Scotland readily gave their affent to the English proposals, and even agreed, that their young fovereign should be educated in the court of Edward. Anxious, however, for the liberty and independancy of their country, they took care to stipulate very equitable conditions, ere they entrusted themselves into the hands of so great and so am- C H A P. bitious a monarch. It was agreed, that they should enjoy all their ancient laws, liberties, and customs; that in case young Edward and Margaret should die without issue, the crown of Scotland should revert to the next heir, and should be inherited by him free and independant; that the military tenants of the crown should never be obliged to go out of Scotland, in order to do homage to the fovereign of the united kingdoms, nor the chapters of cathedral, collegiate, or conventual churches, in order to make elections; that the parliaments, fummoned for Scottish affairs, should always be held within the bounds of that kingdom; and that Edward should bind himself, under the penalty of 100,000 marks, payable to the pope for the use of the holy wars, to observe all these articles b. It is not easy to conceive, that two nations could have treated more on a foot of equality than Scotland and England maintained during the whole course of this transaction: And though Edward gave his affent to the article, concerning the future independancy of the Scottish crown, with a faving of his former rights; this reserve gave no alarm to the nobility of Scotland, both because these rights, having hitherto been little heard of, had occasioned no disturbance, and because the Scots had so near a profpect of feeing them entirely absorbed in the rights of their fovereignty.

But this project, fo happily formed and fo amicably conducted, failed of success, by the sudden death of the Norvegian princess, who expired on her passage to Scotland i, and left a very difmal prospect to the kingdom. Though diforders were for the present obviated by the Competitor authority of the regency formerly established, the suc- for the

p. 268.

h Rymer, vol. ii. p. 482. I Heming, vol. i. p. 30. Trivet, Scotland.

C H A P. cession itself of the crown was now become an object of dispute; and the regents could not expect, that a controverfy, which is not usually decided by reason and argument alone, would be peaceably fettled by them, or even by the states of the kingdom, amidst so many powerful pretenders. The posterity of William, king of Scotland, the prince taken prisoner by Henry II. being all extinct by the death of Margaret of Norway: the right to the crown devolved on the iffue of David, earl of Huntingdon, brother to William, whose male line, being also extinct, left the succession open to the posterity of his daughters. The earl of Huntingdon had three daughters; Margaret, married to Alan lord of Galloway, Ifabella, wife of Robert Brus or Bruce, lord of Annandale, and Adama, who espoused Henry lord Hastings. Margaret, the eldest of the fifters, left one daughter, Devergilda, married to John Baliol, by whom she had a son of the same name, one of the present competitors for the crown: Isabella, the second, bore a son, Robert Bruce, who was now alive, and who also insisted on his claim: Adama the third left a fon, John Hastings, who pretended, that the kingdom of Scotland, like many other inheritances, was divifible among the three daughters of the earl of Huntingdon, and that he, in right of his mother, had a title to a third of it. Baliol and Bruce united against Haftings, in maintaining that the kingdom was indivisible; but each of them, supported by plausible reasons, afferted the preference of his own title. Baliol was fprung from the elder branch: Bruce was one degree nearer the common flock: If the principle of representation was regarded, the former had the better claim: If propinquity was confidered, the latter was entitled to the preference k: The fentiments of men were divided: All the nobility had taken part on one fide or the other:

The people followed implicitly their leaders: The two C H A P. claimants themselves had great power and numerous re- XIII. tainers in Scotland: And it is no wonder, that, among a rude people, more accustomed to arms than enured to laws, a controversy of this nature, which could not be decided by any former precedent among them, and which is capable of exciting commotions in the most legal and best established governments, should threaten the state with the most fatal convulsions.

EACH century has its peculiar mode in conducting bufiness; and men, guided more by custom than by reason, follow, without enquiry, the manners, which are prevalent in their own time. The practice of that age, in controversies between states and princes, seems to have been to chuse a foreign prince, as an equal arbiter, by whom the question was decided, and whose sentence prevented those dismal confusions and disorders, inseparable at all times from war, but which were multiplied a hundred fold, and dispersed into every corner, by the nature of the feudal governments. It was thus that the English king and barons, in the preceding reign, had endeavoured to compose their diffensions by a reference to the king of France; and the celebrated integrity of that monarch had prevented all the bad effects, which might naturally have been dreaded from fo perilous an expedient. It was thus that the kings of France and Arragon, and afterwards other princes, had submitted their controversies to Edward's judgment; and the remoteness of their states, the great power of the princes, and the little interest which he had on either side, had induced him to acquit himself with honour in his decisions. The parliament of Scotland, therefore, threatened with a furious civil war, and allured by the great reputation of the English monarch, as well as by the present amicable correspondence between the kingdoms, agreed in making a reference .ar .a I dor .amanali I.

taggous

1291. Reference

CHAP. reference to Edward; and Fraser, bishop of St. Andrews, with other deputies, was fent to notify to him their resolution, and to claim his good offices in the prefent danto Edward. gers to which they were exposed 1. His inclination, they flattered themselves, led him to prevent their dissensions, and to interpole with a power, which none of the competitors would dare to withstand: When this expedient was proposed by one party, the other deemed it dangerous to object to it: Indifferent persons thought that the imminent perils of a civil war would thereby be prevented: And no one reflected on the ambitious character of Edward. and the almost certain ruin, which must attend a small state, divided by faction, when it thus implicitly fubmits itself to the will of so powerful and encroaching a neighbour.

Scotland.

Homage of THE temptation was too strong for the virtue of the English monarch to refist. He purposed to lay hold of the present favourable opportunity, and if not to create, at least to revive, his claim of a feudal superiority over Scotland; a claim which had hitherto lain in the deepest obscurity, and which, if ever it had been an object of attention, or had been fo much as fuspected, would have effectually prevented the Scottish barons from chusing him for an umpire. He well knew, that, if this pretension were once submitted to, as it seemed difficult, in the present fituation of Scotland, to oppose it, the abso-Jute fovereignty of that kingdom (which had been the case with Wales) would soon follow; and that one great vasfal, cooped up in an island with his liege lord, without resource from foreign powers, without aid from any fellow vastals, could not long maintain his dominions against the efforts of a mighty kingdom, affisted by all the cavils which the feudal law afforded his superior against him. In pursuit of this great object, very advantageous to England, perhaps in the end no less beneficial C H A P. to Scotland, but extremely unjust and iniquitous in itself, Edward busied himself in searching for proofs of his pretended superiority; and instead of looking into his own archives, which, if his claim had been real, must have afforded him numerous records of the homages done by the Scottish princes, and could alone yield him any authentic testimony, he made all the monasteries be ranfacked for old chronicles and histories written by Englishmen, and he collected all the passages, which seemed anywise to favour his pretensions m. Yet even in this method of proceeding, which must have discovered to himself the injustice of his claim, he was far from being fortunate. He began his proofs from the time of Edward the elder, and continued them through all the fubsequent Saxon and Norman times; but produced nothing to his purpose ". The whole amount of his authorities during the Saxon period, when stripped of the bombast and inaccurate style of the monkish historians, is, that the Scots had sometimes been defeated by the English, had received peace on difadvantageous terms, had made fubmiffions to the English monarch, and had even perhaps fallen into some dependance on a power, which was fo much superior, and which they had not at that time fufficient force to refist. His authorities from the Norman period were, if possible, still less conclusive: The historians indeed make frequent mention of homage done by the northern potentate; but no one of them fays that it was done for his kingdom, and feveral of them declare, in express terms, that it was relative only to the fiefs which he enjoyed fouth of the Tweed o; in the same manner, as the king of England himself swore fealty to the French monarch, for the fiefs which he inherited in France. And to fuch

m Walfing. p. 55. p. Rymer, vol. ii. p. 559. p. 492, 662. M. Patis, p. 109. M. West. p. 256.

passage from Hoveden P, where it is afferted, that a Scot1291. tish king had done homage to England; but he purposely omits the latter part of the sentence, which expresses that this prince did homage for the lands which he held in England.

WHEN William, king of Scotland, was taken prisoner in the battle of Alnwic, he was obliged, for the recovery of his liberty, to fwear fealty to the victor for his crown itself. The deed was performed according to all the rites of the feudal law: The record was preserved in the English archives, and is mentioned by all the historians: But as it is the only one of the kind, and as historians fpeak of this superiority as a great acquisition gained by the fortunate arms of Henry II. 9 there can remain no doubt, that the kingdom of Scotland was, in all former periods, entirely free and independant. Its subjection continued a very few years: King Richard, defirous, before his departure for the Holy Land, to conciliate the friendship of William, renounced that homage, which, he fays in express terms, had been extorted by his father; and he only retained the usual homage which had been done by the Scottish princes for the lands which they held in England.

But though this transaction rendered the independance of Scotland still more unquestionable, than if no fealty had ever been sworn to the English crown; the Scottish kings, apprized of the point aimed at by their powerful neighbours, seem for a long time to have retained some jealousy on that head, and in doing homage, to have anxiously obviated all such pretensions. When William in 1200 did homage to John at Lincoln, he was careful to insert a salvo for his royal dignity: When Alexander III. sent assistance to his father-in-law, Henry III. during knowledgment, that this aid was granted only from friendship, not from any right claimed by the English monarch. And when the same prince was invited to affist at the coronation of this very Edward, he declined attendance, till he received a like acknowledgment.

P. 662. 9 Neubr. lib. ii, cap. 4. Knyghton, p. 2392.

Hoveden, p. 811.

Bur as all these reasons (and stronger could not be produced) were but a feeble rampart against the power of the fword, Edward, carrying with him a great army, which was to enforce his proofs, advanced to the frontiers, and invited the Scottish parliament and all the competitors to attend him in the castle of Norham, a place situated on the fouthern banks of the Tweed, in order to determine that cause, which had been referred to his arbitration. But though this deference feemed due to fo great a monarch, and was no more than what his father and the English barons had, in similar circumstances, paid to Lewis IX. the king, careful not to give umbrage, and determined never to produce his claim, till it should be too late to think of opposition, fent the Scottish barons an acknowledgment, that, though at that time they passed the frontiers, this step should never be drawn into precedent, or afford the English kings a pretence for exacting a like fubmission in any future transaction ". 10th May. When the whole Scottish nation had thus unwarily put themselves in his power, Edward opened the conferences at Norham: He informed the parliament, by the mouth of Roger le Brabançon, his chief justiciary, that he was come thither to determine the right among the competitors to their crown; that he was determined to do frict justice to all parties; and that he was intitled to this authority, not in virtue of the reference made to him, but in quality of fuperior and liege lord of the kingdom w.

s Rymer, vol. ii. p. 844.

t See note [B] at the end of the volume.

u Rymer, vol. ii. p. 539. 845. Walfing. p. 56.

w Rymer, vol. ii.

P. 543. See note [C] at the end of the volume.

purpose.

Pretended to be unquestionable, and he required of them an acknowledgment of it; a demand, which was superfluous if the fact were already known and avowed, and which plainly betrays Edward's consciousness of his lame and desective title. The Scottish parliament was assonished at so new a pretension, and answered only by their silence. But the king, in order to maintain the appearance of free and regular proceedings, desired them to remove into their own country, to deliberate upon his claim, to examine his proofs, to propose all their objections, and to inform him of their resolution: And he appointed a plain at Upfettleton, on the northern banks of the Tweed, for that

WHEN the Scottish barons assembled in this place, though moved with indignation at the injustice of this unexpected claim, and at the fraud with which it had been conducted, they found themselves betrayed into a fituation, in which it was impossible for them to make any defence for the ancient liberty and independance of their country. The king of England, a martial and politic prince, at the head of a powerful army, lay at a very fmall distance, and was only separated from them by a river fordable in many places. Though by a fudden flight fome of them might themselves be able to make their escape; what hopes could they entertain of securing the kingdom against his future enterprizes? Without a head, without union among themselves, attached all of them to different competitors, whose title they had rashly fubmitted to the decision of this foreign usurper, and who were thereby reduced to an absolute dependance upon him; they could only expect by refistance to entail on themselves and their posterity a more grievous and more destructive servitude. Yet even in this desperate state of their affairs, the Scottish barons, as we learn from Walfingham, fingham", one of the best historians of that period, had C H A P. the courage to reply, that, till they had a king, they could take no refolution on fo momentous a point: The journal of king Edward fays, that they made no answer at all x: That is, perhaps, no particular answer or objection to Edward's claim: And by this folution it is possible to reconcile the journal with the historian. The king, therefore, interpreting their filence as confent, addressed himself to the feveral competitors, and previously to his pronouncing fentence, required their acknowledgment of his superiority.

IT is evident from the genealogy of the royal family of Scotland, that there could only be two questions about the fuccession, that between Baliol and Bruce on the one hand, and lord Hastings on the other, concerning the partition of the crown; and that between Baliol and Bruce themselves, concerning the preference of their respective titles, supposing the kingdom indivisible: Yet there appeared on this occasion no less than nine claimants besides: John Comyn or Cummin lord of Badenoch, Florence earl of Holland, Patric Dunbar earl of March, William de Vescey, Robert de Pynkeni, Nicholas de Soules, Patric Galythly, Roger de Mandeville, Robert de Ross; not to mention the king of Norway, who claimed as heir to his daughter Margaret v. Some of these competitors were descended from more remote branches of the royal family; others were even fprung from illegitimate children; and as none of them had the least pretence of right, it is natural to conjecture, that Edward had fecretly encouraged them to appear in the lift of claimants, that he might fow the more division among the Scottish nobility, make

M. West. p. 436. It is faid by Hemingford, vol, i. p. 330 that the king menaced violently the Scotch barons, and forced them to coupliance, at least to filence. z Rymer, vol. ii. p. 548.

Y Walfing. p. 58.

C H A P the cause appear the more intricate, and be able to chuse, among a great number, the most obsequious candidate.

Rum he found them all equally obsequious on this occa-

Bur he found them all equally obsequious on this occafion 2. Robert Bruce was the first that acknowledged Edward's right of superiority over Scotland; and he had fo far foreseen the king's pretensions, that even in his petition, where he fet forth his claim to the crown, he had previously applied to him as liege lord of the kingdom; a flep which was not taken by any of the other competitors a. They all, however, with feeming willingness, made a like acknowledgment when required; though Baliol, left he should give offence to the Scottish nation, had taken care to be absent during the first days; and he was the last that recognized the king's title b. Edward next deliberated concerning the method of proceeding in the difcuffion of this great controversy. He gave orders, that Baliol, and fuch of the competitors as adhered to him, should chuse forty commissioners; Bruce and his adherents forty more: To these the king added twenty-four Englishmen: He ordered these hundred and four commissioners to examine the cause deliberately among themfelves, and make their report to him : And he promifed in the ensuing year to give his determination. Mean while, he pretended, that it was requifite to have all the fortresses of Scotland delivered into his hands, in order to enable him, without opposition, to put the true heir in possession of the crown; and this exorbitant demand was complied with, both by the states and by the claimants d. The governors also of all the castles immediately refigned their command; except Umfreville earl of Angus, who refused, without a formal and particular acquittal from the parliament and the feveral claimants, z Rymer, vol. ii. p. 529. 545. Walfing, p. 56. Heming, vol. ii. p. 33; 34. Trivet, p. 260. M. West. p. 415.

1.15

3 Rymer, vol. ii. p. 577,

578, 579.

b Ibid. p. 546.
c Ibid. p. 555, 556.
d Ibid. p. 529. Walfing, p. 56, 57.

to furrender his fortreffes to fo domineering an arbiter, C H A P. who had given to Scotland fo many just reasons of sufpicion . Before this affembly broke up, which had fixed fuch a mark of dishonour on the nation, all the prelates and barons there present swore fealty to Edward; and that prince appointed commissioners to receive a like oath from all the other barons and persons of distinction in Scotland f.

THE king, having finally made, as he imagined, this important acquifition, left the commissioners to fit at Berwic, and examine the titles of the feveral competitors, who claimed the precarious crown, which Edward was willing for some time to allow the lawful heir to enjoy. He went fouthwards, both in order to affift at the funeral of his mother, queen Eleanor, who died about this time, and to compose some differences which had arisen among his principal nobility. Gilbert earl of Glocester, the greatest baron of the kingdom, had espoused the king's daughter; and being elated by that alliance, and still more by his own power, which, he thought, fet him above the laws, he permitted his bailiffs and vaffals to commit violence on the lands of Humphrey Bohun earl of Hereford, who retaliated the injury by like violence. But this was not a reign in which fuch illegal proceedings could pass with impunity. Edward procured a sentence against the two earls, committed them both to prison, and would not restore them to their liberty, till he exacted a fine of 1000 marks from Hereford, and one of 10,000 from his fon-in-law.

DURING this interval, the titles of John Baliol and of Robert Bruce, whose claims appeared to be the best founded among the competitors for the crown of Scot-

1292

C H A P. land, were the subject of general disquisition, as well as of debate among the commissioners. Edward, in order to give greater authority to his intended decision, proposed this general question both to the commissioners, and to give greater authority to his intended decision, proposed this general question both to the commissioners, and to all the celebrated lawyers in Europe; Whether a person descended from the elder sister, but farther removed by one degree, were preferable, in the succession of kingdoms, fiefs, and other indivisible inheritances, to one descended from the younger fister, but one degree nearer to the common flock? This was the true flate of the case; and the principle of representation had now gained such ground every where, that a uniform answer was returned to the king in the affirmative. He therefore pronounced sentence in favour of Baliol; and when Bruce, upon this difappointment, joined afterwards lord Hastings, and claimed a third of the kingdom, which he now pretended to be divisible, Edward, though his interests seemed more to require the partition of Scotland, again pronounced fentence in favour of Baliol. That competitor, upon renewing his oath of fealty to England, was put in possession of the kingdom g; all his fortresses were restored to him h; and the conduct of Edward, both in the deliberate folemnity of the proceedings, and in the justice of the award, was fo far unexceptionable.

Award of Edward in favour of Baliol.

1293.

HAD the king entertained no other view than that of establishing his superiority over Scotland, though the iniquity of that claim was apparent, and was aggravated by the most egregious breach of trust, he might have fixed his pretensions, and have left that important acquisition to his posterity: But he immediately proceeded in such a manner, as made it evident, that, not content with this usurpation, he aimed also at the absolute sovereignty and

g Rymer, vol. ii. p. 590, 591. 593. 600. p. 590.

h Rymer, vol. ii.

dominion

12930

dominion of the kingdom. Instead of gradually enuring C H A P. the Scots to the yoke, and exerting his rights of fuperiority with moderation, he encouraged all appeals to England; required king John himself, by fix different summons on trivial occasions, to come to London i; refused him the privilege of defending his cause by a procurator; and obliged him to appear at the bar of his parliament as a private person k. These humiliating demands were hitherto quite unknown to a king of Scotland: They are however the necessary consequence of vassalage by the feudal law; and as there was no preceding instance of such treatment submitted to by a prince of that country, Edward must, from that circumstance alone, had there remained any doubt, have been himself convinced, that his claim was altogether an usurpation *. But his intention plainly was, to enrage Baliol by these indignities, to engage him in rebellion, and to assume the dominion of the state as the punishment of his treason and felony. Accordingly Baliol, though a prince of a foft and gentle spirit, returned into Scotland highly provoked at this usage, and determined at all hazards to vindicate his liberty; and the war, which foon after broke out between France and England, gave him a favourable opportunity of executing his purpofe.

THE violence, robberies, and diforders, to which that age was fo subject, were not confined to the licentious barons and their retainers at land: The fea was equally infested with piracy: The feeble execution of the laws had given licence to all orders of men: And a general appetite for rapine and revenge, supported by a false point of honour, had also infected the merchants and mariners; and it pushed them, on any provocation, to seek redress, by immediate retaliation upon the aggressors. A Norman

S 2

¹ Rymer, vol. ii. p. 603. 605, 606. 608. 615, 616. * See note [D] at the end of the volume. Placit, Parl, p. 152, 153.

War with France.

C H A P, and an English vessel met off the coast near Bayonne; and both of them having occasion for water, they sent their boats to land, and the feveral crews came at the fame time to the same spring: There ensued a quarrel for the preference: A Norman, drawing his dagger, attempted to stab an Englishman; who, grappling with him, threw his adversary on the ground; and the Norman, as was pretended, falling on his own dagger, was flain 1. This scuffle between two seamen about water, soon kindled a bloody war between the two nations, and involved a great part of Europe in the quarrel. The mariners of the Norman ship carried their complaints to the French king: Philip, without enquiring into the fact, without demanding redrefs, bade them take revenge, and trouble him no more about the matter m. The Normans, who had been more regular than usual in applying to the crown, needed but this hint to proceed to immediate violence. They feized an English ship in the channel; and hanging, along with fome dogs, feveral of the crew on the vard-arm, in presence of their companions, dismissed the veffel "; and bade the mariners inform their countrymen, that vengeance was now taken for the blood of the Norman killed at Bayonne. This injury, accompanied with fo general and deliberate an infult, was refented by the mariners of the cinque ports, who, without carrying any complaint to the king, or waiting for redrefs, retaliated by committing like barbarities on all French veffels without distinction. The French, provoked by their losses, preyed on the ships of all Edward's subjects, whether English or Gascon: The sea became a scene of piracy between the nations: The fovereigns, without either feconding or repressing the violence of their subjects, seemed to remain indifferent spectators: The English made pri-

m Walfing. p. 58.

¹ Walfing. p. 58. Heming. vol. i. p. 39.

[&]quot; Heming, vol. i. p. 40. M. West. p. 419.

XIII.

1293.

vate affociations with the Irish and Dutch seamen; the C H A P. French with the Flemish and Genoese o: And the animosities of the people on both sides became every day more violent and barbarous. A fleet of two hundred Norman vessels set fail to the fouth for wine and other commodities; and in their passage, seized all the English fhips which they met with; hanged the feamen, and feized the goods. The inhabitants of the English fea-ports, informed of this incident, fitted out a fleet of fixty fail, stronger and better manned than the others, and awaited the enemy on their return. After an obstinate battle, they put them to rout, and funk, deftroyed, or took the greater part of them P. No quarter was given; and it is pretended, that the lofs of the French amounted to 15,000 men: Which is accounted for by this circumstance, that the Norman sleet was employed in transporting a considerable body of soldiers from the fouth.

THE affair was now become too important to be any longer overlooked by the fovereigns. On Philip's fending an envoy to demand reparation and restitution, the king dispatched the bishop of London to the French court, in order to accommodate the quarrel. He first said, that the English courts of justice were open to all men; and if any Frenchman were injured, he might feek reparation by course of law 4. He next offered to adjust the matter by private arbiters, or by a perfonal interview with the king of France, or by a reference either to the pope or the college of cardinals, or any particular cardinals, agreed on by both parties. The French, probably the more difgusted, as they were hitherto losers in the quarrel, refused all these expedients: The vessels and the goods of merchants were confiscated on both fides: Depredations were continued by the Gascons on the western coast of o Heming, vol. i. p. 40. P Walfing. p. 60. Trivet, p. 274. 4 Trivet, p. 275. r Ibid. France, CHAP. France, as well as by the English in the channel: Philip cited the king, as duke of Guienne, to appear in his court at Paris, and answer for these offences: And Edward, apprehensive of danger to that province, sent John St. John, an experienced soldier, to Bourdeaux, and gave him directions to put Guienne in a posture of defence.

Chron. Dunft. vol. ii. p. 609.

1294.

THAT he might however prevent a final rupture between the nations, the king dispatched his brother, Edmond, earl of Lancaster, to Paris; and as this prince had espoused the queen of Navarre, mother to Jane, queen of France, he feemed, on account of that alliance, the most proper person for finding expedients to accommodate the difference. Tane pretended to interpose with her good offices: Mary, the queen-dowager, feigned the fame amicable disposition: And these two princesses told Edmond, that the circumstance, the most difficult to adjust, was the point of honour with Philip, who thought himfelf affronted by the injuries committed against him by his fub-vaffals in Guienne: But if Edward would once consent to give him seizin and possession of that province, he would think his honour fully repaired, would engage to restore Guienne immediately, and would accept of a very easy satisfaction for all the other injuries. The king was consulted on the occasion; and as he then found himself in immediate danger of war with the Scots, which he regarded as the more important concern, this politic prince, blinded by his favourite passion for subduing that nation, allowed himself to be deceived by so gross an artifice t. He fent his brother orders to fign and execute the treaty with the two queens; Philip folemnly promifed to execute his part of it; and the king's citation to appear in the court of France, was accordingly recalled:

s Trivet, p. 276. t Rymer, vol. ii. p. 619, 620. Walfing. p. 61. Heming. vol. i. p. 42, 43. Trivet, p. 277.

But the French monarch was no fooner put in possession C H A P. of Guienne, than the citation was renewed; Edward was condemned for non-appearance; and Guienne, by a formal sentence, was declared to be forseited and annexed to the crown ".

EDWARD, fallen into a like fnare with that which he himself had spread for the Scots, was enraged; and the more so, as he was justly ashamed of his own conduct, in being fo egregiously over-reached by the court of France. Sensible of the extreme difficulties, which he should encounter in the recovery of Gascony, where he had not retained a fingle place in his hands; he endeavoured to compensate that loss, by forming alliances with feveral princes, who, he projected, should attack France on all quarters, and make a diversion of her forces. Adolphus de Nassau, king of the Romans, entered into a treaty with him for that purpose w; as did also Amadæus. count of Savoy, the archbishop of Cologne, the counts of Gueldre and Luxembourg; the duke of Brabant and count of Barre, who had married his two daughters, Margaret and Eleanor: But these alliances were extremely burdenfome to his narrow revenues, and proved in the issue entirely ineffectual. More impression was made on Guienne by an English army, which he completed by emptying the jails of many thousand thieves and robbers, who had been confined there for their crimes. So low had the profession of arms fallen, and so much had it degenerated from the estimation in which it stood during the vigour of the feudal fystem!

THE king himself was detained in England, first by contrary winds *, then by his apprehensions of a Scottish invasion, and by a rebellion of the Welsh, whom he re-

1295.

² Rymer, vol. ii. p. 620, 622. Walfing. p. 61. Trivet, p. 278.

W Heming. vol. i. p. 51, x Chron. Dunft. vol. ii. p. 622.

C H'A P. pressed and brought again under subjection r. The army, which he fent to Guienne, was commanded by his nephew, John de Bretagne, earl of Richmond, and under him by St. John, Tibetot, de Vere, and other officers of reputation z; who made themselves masters of the town of Bayonne, as well as of Bourg, Blaye, Reole, St. Severe, and other places, which straitened Bourdeaux, and cut off its communication both by fea and land. The favour, which the Gascon nobility bore to the English government, facilitated these conquests, and seemed to promise still greater successes; but this advantage was foon loft by the misconduct of some of the officers. Philip's brother, Charles de Valois, who commanded the French armies, having laid fiege to Podenfac, a small fortress near Reole, obliged Giffard, the governor, to capitulate; and the articles, though favourable to the English, left all the Gascons prisoners at discretion, of whom about fifty were hanged by Charles as rebels: A policy, by which he both intimidated that people, and produced an irreparable breach between them and the English a. That prince immediately attacked Reole, where the earl of Richmond himself commanded; and as the place seemed not tenable, the English general drew his troops to the water-fide, with an intention of embarking with the greater part of the army. The enraged Gascons fell upon his rear, and at the same time opened their gates to the French, who, besides making themselves masters of the place, took many prisoners of distinction, St. Severe was more vigoroufly defended by Hugh de Vere, fon of the earl of Oxford; but was at last obliged to capitulate. The French king, not content with these succeffes in Gascony, threatened England with an invasion;

y Walfing. p. 62. Heming, vol. i. p. 55. Trivet, p. 282. Chron. Dunst. vol. ii. p. 622, z Trivet, p. 279. a Heming. vol. i. p. 49.

and by a fudden attempt, his troops took and burnt Do- C H A P. ver b, but were obliged foon after to retire. And in order to make a greater diversion of the English force, and engage Edward in dangerous and important wars, he formed a fecret alliance with John Baliol, king of Scotland; the commencement of that strict union, which, during fo many centuries, was maintained, by mutual interests and necessities, between the French and Scottish nations. John confirmed this alliance by stipulating a marriage between his eldest fon and the daughter of Charles de Valois c.

THE expences attending these multiplied wars of Ed-Digression ward, and his preparations for war, joined to alterations concerning the conflituwhich had infenfibly taken place in the general state of tion of paraffairs, obliged him to have frequent recourse to parliamentary supplies, introduced the lower orders of the state into the public councils, and laid the foundations of great and important changes in the government.

THOUGH nothing could be worfe calculated for cultivating the arts of peace or maintaining peace itself, than the long fubordination of vaffalage from the king to the meanest gentleman, and the consequent slavery of the lower people, evils inseparable from the feudal system; that fystem was never able to fix the state in a proper warlike posture, or give it the full exertion of its power for defence, and still less for offence, against a public enemy. The military tenants, unacquainted with obedience, unexperienced in war, held a rank in the troops by their birth, not by their merits or fervices; composed a diforderly and confequently a feeble army; and during the few days, which they were obliged by their tenures to remain in the field, were often more formidable to their own prince than to foreign powers, against whom they were affembled. The fovereigns came gradually to difuse

b Trivet, p. 284. Chron. Dunfl. vol. ii. p. 642. Chron. Dunfl. vol. ii. p. 642. Rymer, vol. ii. p. 680, 681. 695. 697. Heming. vol. i. p. 76. Trivet, p. 285.

this

C H A P. this cumbersome and dangerous machine, so apt to recoil upon the hand which held it; and exchanging the military fervice for pecuniary supplies, inlisted forces by 1295 means of a contract with particular officers, (fuch as those the Italians denominate Condottieri) whom they dismissed at the end of the ward. The barons and knights themfelves often entered into these engagements with the prince; and were enabled to fill their bands, both by the authority which they possessed over their vassals and tenants, and from the great numbers of loofe, diforderly people, whom they found on their estates, and who willingly embraced an opportunity of gratifying their appetite for war and rapine.

> MEAN-WHILE, the old Gothic fabric, being neglected, went gradually to decay. Though the Conqueror had divided all the lands of England into fixty thousand knights' fees, the number of these was insensibly diminished by various artifices; and the king at last found, that, by putting the law in execution, he could affemble a small part only of the ancient force of the kingdom. It was a usual expedient for men, who held of the king or great barons by military tenure, to transfer their land to the church, and receive it back by another tenure called frankalmoigne, by which they were not bound to perform any service . A law was made against this practice; but the abuse had probably gone far before it was attended to, and probably was not entirely corrected by the new statute, which, like most laws of that age, we may conjecture to have been but feebly executed by the magistrate against the perpetual interest of fo many individuals. The constable and mareschal, when they mustered the armies, often, in a hurry, and for want of better information, received the service of a baron for fewer knights' fees, than were due by him; and one precedent of this

Sidis

of the Trivet, practice

d Cotton's Abr. p. 11. e Madox's Baronia Anglica, p. 114.

kind was held good against the king, and became ever C H A P. after a reason for diminishing the service f. The rolls of knights' fees were inaccurately kept; no care was taken to correct them before the armies were fummoned into the field s; it was then too late to think of examining records and charters; and the fervice was accepted on the footing which the vaffal himfelf was pleafed to acknowledge, after all the various fubdivisions and conjunctions of property had thrown an obscurity on the nature and extent of his tenure b. It is easy to judge of the intricacies which would attend disputes of this kind with individuals; when even the number of military fees, belonging to the church, whose property was fixed and unalienable, became the fubject of controversy; and we find in particular, that, when the bishop of Durham was charged with seventy knights' fees for the aid levied on occasion of the marriage of Henry II.'s daughter to the duke of Saxony, the prelate acknowledged ten, and disowned the other fixty i. It is not known in what manner this difference was terminated; but had the question been concerning an armament to defend the kingdom, the bishop's service would probably have been received without opposition for ten fees; and this rate must also have fixed all his future payments. Pecuniary scutages, therefore, diminished as much as military fervices k: Other methods of filling the exchequer as well as the armies must be devised: New situations

f Madox's Baronia Anglica, p. 115.

g We hear only of one king, Henry II. who took this pains; and the record, called Liber niger Scaccarii, was the result of it.

h Madox, Bar. Ang. p. 116. i Ibid. p. 122. Hift. of Exch.

k In order to pay the fum of 100,000 marks, as king Richard's ransom, twenty shillings were imposed on each knight's see. Had the sees remained on the original footing, as settled by the Conqueror, this scutage would have amounted to 90,000 marks, which was nearly the sum required: But we find, that other grievous taxes were imposed to complete it: A certain proof, that many frauds and abuses had prevailed in the roll of knights sees.

CHAP. produced new laws and inflitutions: And the great alterations in the finances and military power of the crown, as well as in private property, were the fource of equal innovations in every part of the legislature or civil government.

THE exorbitant estates, conferred by the Norman on his barons and chieftains, remained not long entire and unimpaired. The landed property was gradually shared out into more hands; and those immense baronies were divided, either by provisions to younger children, by partitions among co-heirs, by fale, or by escheating to the king, who gratified a great number of his courtiers, by dealing them out among them in smaller portions. Such moderate estates, as they required economy, and confined the proprietors to live at home, were better calculated for duration; and the order of knights and fmall barons grew daily more numerous, and began to form a very respectable rank or order in the state. As they were all immediate vaffals of the crown by military tenure, they were, by the principles of the feudal law, equally intitled with the greatest barons to a feat in the national or general councils; and this right, though regarded as a privilege, which the owners would not entirely relinquish, was also confidered as a burthen, which they defired to be subjected to on extraordinary occasions only. Hence it was provided in the charter of king John, that, while the great barons were summoned to the national council by a particular writ, the fmall barons, under which appellation the knights were also comprehended, should only be called by a general fummons of the fheriff. The diffinction between great and fmall barons, like that between rich and poor, was not exactly defined; but, agreeably to the inaccurate genius of that age and to the fimplicity of ancient government, was left very much to be determined by the discretion of the king and his ministers. It was usual for the prince to require, by a particular sum- C H A P. mons, the attendance of a baron in one parliament, and to neglect him in future parliaments 1; nor was this uncertainty ever complained of as an injury. He attended when required: He was better pleased on other occasions to be exempted from the burthen: And as he was acknowledged to be of the fame order with the greatest barons, it gave them no furprize to fee him take his feat in the great council, whether he appeared of his own accord. or by a particular fummons from the king. The barons by Writ, therefore, began gradually to intermix themfelves with the barons by Tenure; and, as Camden tells us m, from an ancient manuscript, now lost, that, after the battle of Evelham, a politive law was enacted, prohibiting every baron from appearing in parliament, who was not invited thither by a particular fummons, the whole baronage of England held thenceforward their feat by writ, and this important privilege of their tenures was in effect abolished. Only, where writs had been regularly continued for some time in one great family. the omission of them would have been regarded as an affront, and even as an injury.

A LIKE alteration gradually took place in the order of earls, who were the highest rank of barons. The dignity of an earl, like that of a baron, was anciently territorial and official ": He exercised jurisdiction within his county: He levied the third of the fines to his own profit: He was at once a civil and a military magistrate: And though his authority, from the time of the Norman conquest, was hereditary in England, the title was so much connected with the office, that, where the king intended to create a new earl, he had no other expedient than to erect a certain territory into a county or earldom,

¹ Chancellor West's enquiry into the manner of creating peers, p. 43. 46, 47. 55. m In Britann, p. 132. a Speilm, Gloff, in voce Comesa

C H A P. and to bestow it upon the person and his family . But as the sheriffs, who were the vice-gerents of the earls. were named by the king, and removeable at pleafure, he found them more dependant upon him; and endeavoured to throw the whole authority and jurisdiction of the office into their hands. This magistrate was at the head of the finances, and levied all the king's rents within the county: He affessed at pleasure the talliages of the inhabitants in royal demefne: He had usually committed to him the management of wards and often of escheats: He presided in the lower courts of judicature: And thus, though inferior to the earl in dignity, he was foon confidered, by this union of the judicial and fiscal powers, and by the confidence reposed in him by the king, as much superior to him in authority, and undermined his influence within his own jurisdiction P. It became usual, in creating an earl, to give him a fixed falary, commonly about twenty pounds a year, in lieu of his third of the fines: The diminution of his power kept pace with the retrenchment of his profit: And the dignity of earl, instead of being territorial and official, dwindled into personal and titular. Such were the mighty alterations, which already had fully taken place, or were gradually advancing, in the house of peers; that is, in the parliament: For there feems anciently to have been no other house.

But though the introduction of barons by writ, and of titular earls, had given some encrease to royal authority; there were other causes, which counterbalanced those innovations, and tended in a higher degree to diminish the power of the sovereign. The difuse, into which the feudal militia had in a great measure fallen, o Esfays on British antiquities. This practice, however, seems to have been more familiar in Scotland and the kingdoms on the continent, than in England.

P There are instances of princes of the blood who accepted of the office of theriff. Spellman in voce Vicecomes.

made the barons almost entirely forget their dependence C H A P. on the crown: By the diminution of the number of knights fees, the king had no reasonable compensation when he levied fcutages and exchanged their fervice for money: The alienations of the crown lands had reduced him to poverty: And above all, the concession of the Great Charter had fet bounds to royal power, and had rendered it more difficult and dangerous for the prince to exert any extraordinary act of arbitrary authority. In this fituation it was natural for the king to court the friendship of the lesser barons and knights, whose influence was no ways dangerous to him, and who, being exposed to oppression from their powerful neighbours, fought a legal protection under the shadow of the throne. He defired, therefore, to have their presence in parliament, where they ferved to controul the turbulent refolutions of the great. To exact a regular attendance of the whole body would have produced confusion, and would have imposed too heavy a burden upon them. To fummon only a few by writ, though it was practifed and had a good effect, ferved not entirely the king's purpose; because these members had no farther authority than attended their personal character, and were eclipsed by the appearance of the more powerful nobility. He therefore dispensed with the attendance of most of the lesser barons in parliament; and in return for this indulgence (for fuch it was then esteemed) required them to chuse in each county a certain number of their own body, whose charges they bore, and who, having gained the confidence, carried with them, of course, the authority, of the whole order. This expedient had been practifed at different times, in the reign of Henry III. 9 and regularly, during that of the present king. The numbers sent up took their feat among the other peers; because by their tenure they belonged to that order. The introducing of them into that house scarcely appeared an innovation:

⁹ Rot. Clauf. 38. Hen. III. m. 7. and 12 d.: As also Rot. Clauf. 42. Hen. III. m. t. d. Prynne's Pref. to Cotton's Abridgment.

And though it was easily in the king's power, by varying their number, to command the resolutions of the whole parliament, this circumstance was little attended to, in an age when force was more prevalent than laws, and when a resolution, though taken by the majority of a legal assembly, could not be executed, if it opposed the will of the more powerful minority.

But there were other important confequences, which followed the diminution and confequent difuse of the ancient feudal militia. The king's expence, in levying and maintaining a military force for every enterprize, was encreased beyond what his narrow revenues were able to bear: As the scutages of his military tenants, which were accepted in lieu of their perfonal fervice, had fallen to nothing; there were no means of fupply but from voluntary aids granted him by the parliament and clergy: Or from the talliages which he might levy upon the towns and inhabitants in royal demesne. In the preceding year, Edward had been obliged to exact no less than the fixth of all moveables from the laity, and a moiety of all ecclefiaffical benefices t for his expedition into Poictou, and the fuppression of the Welsh: And this distressful situation, which was likely often to return upon him and his fucceffors, made him think of a new device, and fummon the representatives of all the boroughs to parliament. This period, which is the twenty-third of his reign, feems to be the real and true epoch of the house of commons; and the faint dawn of popular government in England.

r Brady's answer to Petyt, from the records, p. 151. s Brady's Treatise of Boroughs, App. No. 13. t Ibid. p. 31. from the records. Heming. vol. i. p. 52. M. West. p. 422. Ryley, p. 462.

For the representatives of the counties were only depu-C H A P. ties from the smaller barons and lesser nobility: And the former precedent of representatives from the boroughs, who were fummoned by the earl of Leicester, was regarded as the act of a violent usurpation, had been difcontinued in all the subsequent parliaments, and if such a measure had not become necessary on other accounts, that precedent was more likely to blast than give credit to it.

During the course of several years, the kings of England, in imitation of other European princes, had embraced the falutary policy of encouraging and protecting the lower and more industrious orders of the state; whom they found well disposed to obey the laws and civil magistrate, and whose ingenuity and labour furnished commodities, requifite for the ornament of peace and support of war. Though the inhabitants of the country were ftill left at the disposal of their imperious lords; many attempts were made to give more fecurity and liberty to citizens, and make them enjoy unmolested the fruits of their industry. Boroughs were erected by royal patent within the demefne lands: Liberty of trade was conferred upon them: The inhabitants were allowed to farm at a fixed rent their own tolls and customs ": They were permitted to elect their own magistrates: Justice was administered to them by these magistrates, without obliging them to attend the sheriff or county court : And some shadow of independence, by means of these equitable privileges, was gradually acquired by the people w. The king, however, retained still the power of levying talliages or taxes upon them at pleasure x; and though their u Madox, Firma Burgi, p. 21. W Brady of Boroughs, App. No. 1, 2, 3, * The king had not only the power of talliating the inhabitants within his own demesnes, but that of granting to particular barons the power of talliating the inhabitants within theirs. See Brady's answer to Petyt, p. 118. Madox's Hift. of the Exchequer, p. 518.

XIII.

1295.

C H A P. poverty and the customs of the age made these demands neither frequent nor exorbitant, such unlimited authority in the fovereign was a fensible check upon commerce, and was utterly incompatible with all the principles of a free government. But when the multiplied necessities of the crown produced a greater avidity for fupply, the king. whose prerogative entitled him to exact it, found that he had not power sufficient to enforce his edicts, and that it was necessary, be fore he imposed taxes, to smooth the way for his demand, and to obtain the previous consent of the boroughs, by folicitations, remonstrances, and authority. The inconvenience of transacting this business with every particular borough was foon felt; and Edward became fensible, that the most expeditious way of obtaining supply, was to affemble the deputies of all the boroughs, to lay before them the necessities of the state, to difcufs the matter in their presence, and to require their confent to the demands of their fovereign. For this reason, he issued writs to the sheriffs, enjoining them to send to parliament, along with two knights of the shire, two deputies from each borough within their county, and these provided with sufficient powers from their community, to confent, in their name, to what he and his council should require of them. As it is a most equitable rule, fays he, in his preamble to this writ, that what concerns all should be approved of by all; and common dangers be repelled by united efforts 2; a noble principle, which may feem to indicate a liberal mind in the king, and

y Writs were issued to about 120 cities and boroughs.

Brady of boroughs, p. 25. 33. from the records. The write of the parliament immediately preceding, remain; and the return of knights is there required, but not a word of the boroughs: A demonstration, that this was the very year in which they commenced. In the year immediately preceding, the taxes were levied by a feeming free confent of each particular borough, beginning with London. Id. p. 31, 32, 33. from the records. Also his answer to Petyt, p. 40, 41.

which laid the foundation of a free and an equitable go- E H A P. vernment.

1295.

AFTER the election of these deputies, by the aldermen and common council, they gave fureties for their attendance before the king and parliament: Their charges were respectively borne by the borough, which sent them; And they had so little idea of appearing as legislators, a character extremely wide of their low rank and condition a, that no intelligence could be more difagreeable to any borough, than to find that they must elect, or to any individual than that he was elected, to a trust from which no profit or honour could poffibly be derived b. They composed not, properly speaking, any essential part of the parliament: They fat apart both from the barons and knights , who difdained to mix with fuch mean personages: After they had given their consent to the taxes required of them, their business being then finished, they separated, even though the parliament still continued to fit, and to canvass the national business 4: And as they all confifted of men, who were real burgeffes of the place from which they were fent, the sheriff, when he found no person of abilities or wealth sufficient for the office, often used the freedom of omitting particular boroughs in his returns; and as he received the thanks of the people for this indulgence, he gave no displeasure to the court, who levied on all the boroughs, without distinction, the tax agreed to by the majority of deputies .

THE

a Reliquia Spellm. p. 64. Prynne's pref. to Cotton's Abridg, and the Abridg, passim.

Brady of Boroughs, p. 59, 60.

1 bid,
p. 37, 38. from the records, and append. p. 19. Also his append. to his answ. to Petyt, Record. And his gloss: in Verb. Communitas Regn. p. 33.

d Ryley's Placit. Parl. p. 241, 242, &c. Cotton's Abridg. p. 14.

e Brady of Boroughs, p. 52. from the records. There is even an inflance in the reign of Edward III. when the king named all the deputies. Id. anfw. to Petyt, p. 161. If he fairly named the most considerable and creditable burgesses, little exception would be taken; as their business was not to check

e HAP. THE union, however, of the representatives from the boroughs gave gradually more weight to the whole order; and it became customary for them, in return for the supplies which they granted, to prefer petitions to the crown for the redress of any particular grievance, of which they found reason to complain. The more the king's demands multiplied, the fafter these petitions encreased both in number and authority; and the prince found it difficult to refuse men, whose grants had supported his throne, and to whose affistance he might so soon beagain obliged to have recourfe. The commons however were still much below the rank of legislators f. Their petitions, though they received a verbal affent from the throne, were only the rudiments of laws: The judges were afterwards entrusted with the power of putting them into form: And the king, by adding to them the fanction of his authority, and that fometimes without the affent of the nobles, bestowed validity upon them. The age did not refine fo much as to perceive the danger of these irregularities. No man was displeased, that the fovereign, at the defire of any class of men, should issue an order, which appeared only to concern that class: and his predeceffors were fo near possessing the whole legislative power, that he gave no difgust by assuming it in this feemingly inoffensive manner. But time and farther experience gradually opened men's eyes and corrected these abuses. It was found, that no laws could be fixed for one order of men without affecting the whole; and that the force and efficacy of laws depended entirely on the terms employed in wording them. The house of peers, therefore, the most powerful order in the state, with reason expected, that their affent should be > the king, but to reason with him, and consent to his demands. It was not till the reign of Richard II. that the sheriffs were deprived of the power of omitting boroughs at pleasure. See Stat. at large, 5th Richard II. cap. 4.

f See note [E] at the end of the volume.

reign of Henry V. the commons required, that no laws fhould be framed merely upon their petitions, unless the flatutes were worded by themselves, and had passed their house in the form of a bill h.

BUT as the same causes, which had produced a partition of property, continued still to operate; the number of knights and leffer barons, or what the English call the gentry, perpetually encreased, and they sunk into a rank still more inferior to the great nobility. The equality of tenure was loft in the great inferiority of power and property; and the house of representatives from the counties was gradually separated from that of the peers, and formed a distinct order in the state i. The growth of commerce, meanwhile, augmented the private wealth and confideration of the burgeffes; the frequent demands of the crown encreased their public importance; and as they refembled the knights of thires in one material circumstance, that of representing particular bodies of men; it no longer appeared unfuitable to unite them together in the same house, and to confound their rights and privileges k. Thus the third estate, that of the commons, reached at last its present form; and as the country gentlemen made thenceforwards no scruple of appearing as deputies from the boroughs, the distinction between the members was entirely lost, and the lower house acquired thence a great accession of weight and importance in the kingdom. Still, however, the office of this estate was h Brady's answ. to Petyt, p. 85. from the records.

Let Cotton's abridgement, p. 13.

k See note [F] at the end of the volume.

g In those instances found in Cotton's abridgement, where the king appears to answer of himself the petitions of the commons, he probably exerted no more than that power, which was long inherent in the crown, of regulating matters by royal edicts or proclamations. But no durable or general statute seems ever to have been made by the king from the petition of the commons alone, without the assent of the peers. It is more likely that the peers alone, without the commons, would enact statutes.

fo much advantage to the public. Instead of checking and controuling the authority of the king, they were naturally induced to adhere to him, as the great fountain of law and justice, and to support him against the power of the aristocracy, which at once was the source of oppreffion to themselves, and disturbed him in the execution of the laws. The king, in his turn, gave countenance to an order of men, so useful and so little dangerous: The peers also were obliged to pay them some consideration: And by this means, the third estate, formerly so abject in England, as well as in all other European nations, rose by flow degrees to their present importance; and in their

WHAT sufficiently proves, that the commencement of the house of burgesses, who are the true commons, was not an affair of chance, but arose from the necessities of the present situation, is, that Edward, at the very same time, fummoned deputies from the inferior clergy, the first that ever met in England m, and he required them to impose taxes on their constituents for the public service. Formerly the ecclefiastical benefices bore no part of the burthens of the state: The pope indeed of late had often levied impositions upon them: He had sometimes granted this power to the fovereign n: The king himself had in the preceding year exacted, by menaces and violence, a very grievous tax of half the revenues of the clergy: But as this precedent was dangerous, and could not eafily be repeated in a government which required the consent of the subject to any extraordinary resolution, Edward found it more prudent to affemble a lower house of con-progress made arts and commerce, the necessary attendants of liberty and equality, slourish in the kingdom!

¹ See note [G] at the end of the volume.

State of the church of England, p. 235. Brady of Boroughs, p. 34. Gilbert's Hift. of the Exch. p. 46.

n Ann. Waverl. p. 227, 228.

Wykes, p. 99. 120.

vocation, to lay before them his necessities, and to ask C H A P. fome fupply. But on this occasion he met with difficulties. Whether that the clergy thought themselves the most independant body in the kingdom, or were disgusted by the former exorbitant impositions, they absolutely refused their affent to the king's demand of a fifth of their moveables; and it was not till a fecond meeting, that, on their perfishing in this refusal, he was willing to accept of a tenth. The barons and knights granted him, without hesitation, an eleventh; the burgesses, a seventh. But the clergy still scrupled to meet on the king's writ; lest by fuch an inftance of obedience they should seem to acknowledge the authority of the temporal power: And this compromise was at last fallen upon, that the king should issue his writ to the archbishop; and that the archbishop should, in consequence of it, summon the clergy, who, as they then appeared to obey their spiritual superior, no longer hesitated to meet in convocation. This expedient, however, was the cause, why the ecclesiastics were feparated into two houses of convocation, under their feveral archbishops, and formed not one estate, as in other countries of Europe; which was at first the king's intention o. We now return to the course of our narration.

EDWARD, conscious of the reasons of disgust which he had given to the king of Scots, informed of the difpositions of that people, and expecting the most violent effects of their resentment, which he knew he had so well merited; employed the fupplies, granted him by his people, in making preparations against the hostilities of his northern neighbour. When in this fituation, he received intelligence of the treaty fecretly concluded between John and Philip; and though uneafy at this concurrence of a French and Scottish war, he resolved not C H A P. to encourage his enemies by a pulillanimous behaviour, or by yielding to their united efforts. He fummoned $296. John to perform the duty of a vassal, and to fend him a supply of forces against an invasion from France, with which he was then threatened: He next required, that the fortresses of Berwic, Jedborough, and Roxborough, should be put into his hands as a security during the war P: He cited John to appear in an English parliament to be held at Newcastle: And when none of these fuccessive demands were complied with, he marched northward with numerous forces, 30,000 foot, and 4000 horse, to chastise his rebellious vassal. The Scottish nation, who had little reliance on the vigour and abilities of their prince, assigned him a council of twelve noblemen, in whose hands the sovereignty was really lodged q, and who put the country in the best posture of which the present distractions would admit. A great army, composed of 40,000 infantry, though supported only by 500 cavalry, advanced to the frontiers; and after a fruitless attempt upon Carlifle, marched eastwards to defend those provinces which Edward was preparing to attack. But some of the most considerable of the Scottish nobles, Robert Bruce, the father and fon, the earls of March and Angus, prognosticating the ruin of their country, from the concurrence of intestine divisions and a foreign invafion, endeavoured here to ingratiate themselves with Edward, by an early fubmission; and the king, encouraged by this favourable incident, led his army into the enemies? country, and croffed the Tweed without opposition at country, and croffed the Tweed without opposition at sathwarth, Coldstream. He then received a message from John, by which that prince, having now procured, for himself and his nation, pope Celestine's dispensation from former paths, renounced the homage which had been done to p Rymer, vol. ii. p. 692. Walfing, p. 64. Heming, vol. i. p. 84. Trivet, p. 286. 9 Heming, vol. i. p. 75.

England, and fet Edward at defiance . This bravado C H A P. was but ill supported by the military operations of the Scots. Berwic was already taken by affault: Sir William Douglas, the governor, was made prisoner: Above 7000 of the garrison were put to the sword: And Edward, elated by this great advantage, dispatched earl Warrenne with 12,000 men, to lay siege to Dunbar, which was defended by the flower of the Scottiffa

THE Scots, fenfille of the importance of this place, which, if taken, laid their whole country open to the enemy, advanced with their main army, under the command of the earls of Buchan, Lenox, and Marre, in order to relieve it. Warrenne, not difmayed at the great superiority of their number, marched out to give them battle. He attacked them with great vigour; and as un- 27th April. disciplined troops, when numerous, are but the more exposed to a panic upon any alarm, he foon threw them into confusion, and chased them off the field with great flaughter. The lofs of the Scots is faid to have amounted to 20,000 men: The castle of Dunbar, with all its garrison, surrendered next day to Edward, who, after the battle, had brought up the main body of the English, and who now proceeded with an affured confidence of fuccefs. The caftle of Roxborough was yielded by Tames, steward of Scotland; and that nobleman, from whom is descended the royal family of Stuart, was again obliged to swear fealty to Edward. After a feeble resistance, the castles of Edinburgh and Stirling opened their gates to the enemy. All the fouthern parts were instantly fubdued by the English; and to enable them the better to reduce the northern, whose inaccessible situation seemed to give them some more security, Edward sent for a strong reinforcement of Welsh and Irish, who, being

Rymer, vol. ii. p. 607. Walfing. p. 66. Heming. vol. i. p. 92. accustomed

1 95. Scotland Subdued.

C II A P. accustomed to a desultory kind of war, were the best fitted to pursue the fugitive Scots into the recesses of their lakes and mountains. But the spirit of the nation was already broken by their misfortunes; and the feeble and timid Baliol, discontented with his own subjects, and over-awed by the English, abandoned all those resources. which his people might yet have possessed in this extremity. He hastened to make his submissions to Edward: he expressed the deepest penitence for his disloyalty to his liege lord; and he made a folemn and irrevocable refignation of his crown into the hands of that monarch s. Edward marched northwards to Aberdeen and Elgin, without meeting an enemy: No Scotchman approached him but to pay him fubmission and do him homage: Even the turbulent Highlanders, ever refractory to their own princes, and averse to the restraint of laws, endeavoured to prevent the devastation of their country, by giving him early proofs of obedience: And Edward, having brought the whole kingdom to a feeming state of tranquillity, returned to the fouth with his army. There was a stone, to which the popular superstition of the Scots paid the highest veneration: All their kings were feated on it, when they received the rite of inauguration: An ancient tradition affured them, that, wherever this stone was placed, their nation should always govern: And it was carefully preferved at Scone, as the true palladium of their monarchy, and their ultimate resource amidst all their misfortunes. Edward got possession of it; and carried it with him to England t. He gave orders to destroy the records, and all those monuments of antiquity, which might preserve the memory of the independance of the kingdom, and refute the English claims of superiority. The Scots pretend, that he also destroyed all the annals preserved

s Rymer, vol. ii. p. 718. Walfing. p. 67. Heming. vol. i. p. 994 t Walfing. p. 68. Trivet, p. 299. Trivet, p. 292.

preserved in their convents: But it is not probable, that C H A P. a nation, fo rude and unpolished, should be possessed of XIII. any history, which deserves much to be regretted. The great feal of Baliol was broken; and that prince himself was carried prisoner to London, and committed to custody in the Tower. Two years after, he was restored to liberty, and fubmitted to a voluntary banishment in France; where, without making any farther attempts for the recovery of his royalty, he died in a private station. Earl Warrenne was left governor of Scotland ": Englishmen were entrusted with the chief offices: And Edward, flattering himself that he had attained the end of all his wifnes, and that the numerous acts of fraud and violence, which he had practifed against Scotland, had terminated in the final reduction of that kingdom, returned with his victorious army into England.

An attempt, which he made about the same time, for War with the recovery of Guienne, was not equally successful. He France. fent thither an army of 7000 men, under the command of his brother the earl of Lancaster. That prince gained at first some advantages over the French at Bourdeaux: But he was foon after feized with a diftemper, of which he died at Bayonne. The command devolved on the earl of Lincoln, who was not able to perform any thing confiderable during the rest of the campaign w.

BUT the active and ambitious spirit of Edward, while his conquests brought such considerable accessions to the English monarchy, could not be fatisfied, fo long as Guienne, the ancient patrimony of his family, was wrested from him by the dishonest artifices of the French monarch. Finding, that the diffance of that province rendered all his efforts against it feeble and uncertain, he purposed to attack France in a quarter where she appeared more vulnerable;

11 Rymer, vol. ii. p. 726. Trivet, p. 295. 2: 73, 73, 749

w Heming. vol. f.

C H A P. nerable; and with this view, he married his daughter, Elizabeth, to John earl of Holland, and at the same time contracted an alliance with Guy earl of Flanders, stipu-#296. lated to pay him the fum of 75,000 pounds, and projected an invasion with their united forces upon Philip, their common enemy *. He hoped, that, when he himfelf, at the head of the English, Flemish, and Dutch armies, reinforced by his German allies, to whom he had promifed or remitted confiderable fums, should enter the frontiers of France, and threaten the capital itself, Philip would at last be obliged to relinquish his acquisitions, and purchase peace by the restitution of Guienne. But in order to fet this great machine in movement, confiderable supplies were requifite from the parliament; and Edward, without much difficulty, obtained from the barons and knights a new grant of a twelfth of all their moveables, and from the boroughs, that of an eighth. The great and almost unlimited power of the king over the latter, enabled him to throw the heavier part of the burthen on them; and the prejudices, which he feems always to have entertained against the church, on account of the former zeal of the clergy for the Mountfort faction, made him refolve to load them with still more considerable impositions, and he required of them a fifth of their moveables. But he here met with an opposition, which for some time disconcerted all his measures, and engaged him in enterprizes, that were fomewhat dangerous to him; and would have proved fatal to any of his predecessors.

Diffentions with the clergy.

Boniface VIII. who had fucceeded Celestine in the papal throne, was a man of the most lofty and enterprizing spirit; and though not endowed with that severity of manners, which commonly accompanies ambition in men of his order, he was determined to carry the authority of the tiara, and his dominion over the temporal power, to ^{*} Rymer, vol. ii, p. 761, Walfing. p. 68.

1206

as great a height as it had ever attained in any former pe- C H A P. riod. Senfible that his immediate predecessors, by oppresfing the church in every province of Christendom, had extremely alienated the affections of the clergy, and had afforded the civil magistrate a pretence for laying like impositions on ecclesiastical revenues, he attempted to resume the former station of the fovereign pontiff, and to establish himself as the common protector of the spiritual order against all invaders. For this purpose, he issued very early in his pontificate a general bull, prohibiting all princes from levying without his confent any taxes upon the clergy, and all clergymen from submitting to such impositions; and he threatened both of them with the penalties of excommunication in case of disobedience y. This important edict is faid to have been procured by the folicitation of Robert de Winehelfey archbishop of Canterbury, who intended to employ it as a rampart against the violent extortions, which the church had felt from Edward, and the still greater, which that prince's multiplied necessities gave them reason to apprehend. When a demand, therefore, was made on the clergy of a fifth of their moveables, a tax which was probably much more grievous than a fifth of their revenue, as their lands were mostly stocked with their cattle, and cultivated by their villains; the clergy took shelter under the bull of pope Boniface, and pleaded conscience in refusing compliance z. The king came not immediately to extremities on this repulse; but after locking up all their granaries and barns, and prohibiting all rent to be paid them, he appointed a new fynod, to confer with him upon his demand. The primate, not difmayed by these proofs of Edward's resolution, here plainly told him, that the clergy owed obedience to two fovereigns, their spiritual and their tempo-

y Rymer, vol. ii. p. 706. Heming, vol. i. p. 104. Z Heming. vol. i. p. 107. Trivet, p. 296. Chron, Dundt, vol. ii. p. 652.

attachment to the former than to the latter: They could not comply with his commands; (for such, in some measure, the requests of the crown were then deemed) in contradiction to the express prohibition of the sovereign pontiff.

2297.

THE clergy had feen in many instances, that Edward paid little regard to those numerous privileges, on which they fet so high a value. He had formerly seized, in an arbitrary manner, all the money and plate belonging to the churches and convents, and had applied them to the public fervice b; and they could not but expect more violent treatment on this sharp refusal, grounded on such dangerous principles. Instead of applying to the pope for a relaxation of his bull, he refolved immediately to employ the power in his hands; and he told the ecclefiaftics, that, fince they refused to support the civil government, they were unworthy to receive any benefit from it; and he would accordingly put them out of the protection of the laws. This vigorous measure was immediately carried into execution c. Orders were issued to the judges to receive no cause brought before them by the clergy; to hear and decide all causes in which they were defendants: To do every man justice against them; to do them justice against no body d. The ecclefiastics soon found themfelves in the most miserable situation imaginable. They could not remain in their own houses or convents for want of subfishence: If they went abroad, in quest of maintenance, they were dismounted, robbed of their horses and cloaths, abused by every russian, and no redress could be obtained by them for the most violent injury. The primate himfelf was attacked on the highway,

d M. West. p. 429.

p. 51. c Walfing, p. 69. Heming, vol. i. p. 107.

was stripped of his equipage and furniture, and was at CHAP. last reduced to board himself with a fingle servant in the house of a country clergyman f. The king, mean while, remained an indifferent spectator of all these violences; and without employing his officers in committing any immediate injury on the priefts, which might have appeared invidious and oppressive, he took ample vengeance on them for their obstinate refusal of his demands. Though the archbishop issued a general sentence of excommunication against all who attacked the persons or property of ecclefiaftics, it was not regarded: While Edward enjoyed the fatisfaction of feeing the people become the voluntary instruments of his justice against them, and enure themfelves to throw off that respect for the facred order, by which they had fo long been overawed and governed.

THE spirits of the clergy were at last broken by this harsh treatment. Besides that the whole province of York, which lay nearest the danger that still hung over them from the Scots, voluntarily, from the first, voted a fifth of their moveables; the bishops of Salisbury, Ely, and fome others, made a composition for the secular clergy within their dioceses; and they agreed, not to pay the fifth, which would have been an act of disobedience to Boniface's bull, but to deposit a sum equivalent in some church appointed them; whence it was taken by the king's officers s. Many particular convents and clergymen made payment of a like fum, and received the king's protection h. Those who had not ready money, entered into recognizances for the payment. And there was fcarcely found one ecclefiaftic in the kingdom, who feemed willing to fuffer, for the fake of religious privileges, this new species of martyrdom, the most tedious and languishing of any, the most mortifying to spiritual

g Heming. vol. i. p. 108, 109. Chron. f Heming, vol. i. p. 109. h Chron. Dunft. vol. ii. p. 654. Dunft. p. 653.

the church holds up, with fuch offentation, to her devoted adherents.

Arbitrary measures.

Bur as the money, granted by parliament, though confiderable, was not fufficient to fupply the king's neceffities, and that levied by compositions with the clergy came in flowly, Edward was obliged, for the obtaining of farther fupply, to exert his arbitrary power, and to lay an oppressive hand on all orders of men in the kingdom. He limited the merchants in the quantity of wool allowed to be exported; and at the same time forced them to pay him a duty of forty shillings a fack, which was computed to be above the third of the value i. He feized all the rest of the wool, as well as all the leather of the kingdom, into his hands, and disposed of these commodities for his own benefit k: He required the sheriffs of each county to supply him with 2000 quarters of wheat, and as many of oats, which he permitted them to feize wherever they could find them: The cattle and other commodities, necessary for fupplying his army, were laid hold of without the consent of the owners 1: And though he promised to pay afterwards the equivalent of all these goods, men faw but little probability that a prince, who submitted so little to the limitations of law, could ever, amidst his multiplied necessities, be reduced to a strict observance of his engagements. He showed at the same time an equal difregard to the principles of the feudal law, by which all the lands of his kingdom were held: In order to encrease his army, and enable him to support that great effort, which he intended to make against France, he required the attendance of every proprietor of land, possessed of twenty pounds a year, even though he held not of the i Walfing. p. 69. Trivet, p. 296.

k Heming. vol. i, p. 52. 110;

¹ Heming. vol. i. p. 111.

fuch fervice m.

1-974

THESE acts of violence and of arbitrary power, notwithstanding the great personal regard generally borne to the king, bred murmurs in every order of men; and it was not long, ere fome of the great nobility, jealous of their own privileges, as well as of national liberty, gave countenance and authority to these complaints. Edward affembled on the fea-coast an army, which he purposed to fend over to Gascony, while he himself should in person make an impression on the side of Flanders; and he intended to put these forces under the command of Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford, the constable, and Roger Bigod, earl of Norfolk, the Mareschal of England. But these two powerful earls refused to execute his commands, and affirmed, that they were only obliged by their office to attend his person in the wars. A violent altercation enfued; and the king, in the height of his passion, addreffing himself to the constable, exclaimed, Sir earl, by God, you shall either go or hang. By God, Sir King, replied Hereford, I will neither go nor hang ". And he immediately departed, with the mareschal, and above thirty other confiderable barons.

Upon this opposition, the king laid aside the project of an expedition against Guienne; and assembled the forces, which he himself purposed to transport into Flanders. But the two earls, irritated in the contest and elated by impunity, pretending that none of their ancestors had ever served in that country, refused to perform the duty of their office in mustering the army. The king, now finding it adviseable to proceed with moderation, instead of attainting the earls, who possessed their dignities by hereditary right, appointed Thomas de Berke-

m Walfing. p. 69. n Heming. vol. i. p. 112.

º Rymer, vol. ii. p. 783. Walfing. p. 70.

C H A P. ley, and Geoffrey de Geyneville, to act in that emergence, as constable and mareschal p. He endeavoured to reconcile himself with the church; took the primate again into favour 9; made him, in conjunction with Reginald de Grey, tutor to the prince, whom he intended to appoint guardian of the kingdom during his absence; and he even affembled a great number of the nobility in Westminsterhall, to whom he deigned to make an apology for his past conduct. He pleaded the urgent necessities of the crown; his extreme want of money; his engagements from honour as well as interest to support his foreign allies: And he promifed, if ever he returned in fafety, to redrefs all their grievances, to restore the execution of the laws, and to make all his subjects compensation for the losses which they had fustained. Meanwhile, he begged them to sufpend their animolities; to judge of him by his future conduct, of which, he hoped, he should be more master; to remain faithful to his government, or if he perished in the present war, to preserve their allegiance to his son and fucceffor .

> THERE were certainly, from the concurrence of difcontents among the great, and grievances of the people, materials fufficient, in any other period, to have kindled a civil war in England: But the vigour and abilities of Edward kept every one in awe; and his dexterity, in stopping on the brink of danger, and retracting the measures, to which he had been pushed by his violent temper and arbitrary principles, faved the nation from fo great a calamity. The two great earls dared not to break out into open violence: They proceeded no farther than framing a remonstrance, which was delivered to the king at Winchelsea, when he was ready to embark for Flanders. They there complained of the violations of the great charter and that of forests; the violent seizure of corn, leather, cattle, C H A P. and above all, of wool, a commodity, which they affirmed to be equal in value to half the lands of the kingdom; the arbitrary imposition of forty shillings a sack on the small quantity of wool allowed to be exported by the merchants; and they claimed an immediate redress of all these grievances. The king told them, that the greater part of his council were now at a distance, and without their advice he could not deliberate on measures of so great importance.

r Heming, vol. i. p. 114. M. West. p. 430.

P M. West. p. 430. 9 Heming. vol. i. p. 113.

Bur the constable and mareschal, with the barons of Diffensions their party, refolved to take advantage of Edward's ab-with the barons. fence, and to obtain an explicite affent to their demands. When fummoned to attend the parliament at London, they came with a great body of cavalry and infantry; and before they would enter the city, required that the gates should be put into their custody". The primate, who fecretly favoured all their pretenfions, advised the council to comply; and thus they became masters both of the young prince and of the refolutions of parliament. Their demands, however, were moderate; and fuch as fufficiently justify the purity of their intentions in all their past measures: They only required, that the two charters should receive a solemn confirmation; that a clause should be added to secure the nation for ever against all impositions and taxes without consent of parliament; and that they themselves and their adherents, who had refused to attend the king into Flanders, should be pardoned for the offence, and should be again received into favour w. The prince of Wales and his council affented to these terms; and the charters were fent over to the king in Flanders to be there confirmed by him. Edward felt the

^{*} Walfing. p. 72. Heming. vol. i. p. 115. Trivet, p. 302.

t Walfing. p. 72. Heming. vol. i. p. 117. Trivet, p. 304.

u Heming, vol. i. p. 138. w Walfing, p. 73. Heming, vol. i. p. 138, 139, 140, 141. Trivet, p. 308.

CHAP. utmost reluctance to this measure, which, he apprehended, would for the future impose fetters on his conduct, and fet limits to his lawless authority. On various pretences, he delayed three days giving any answer to the deputies; and when the pernicious consequences of his refusal were represented to him, he was at last obliged, after many internal struggles, to affix his seal to the charters, as also to the clause that bereaved him of the power, which he had hitherto assumed, of imposing arbitrary taxes upon the people x.

THAT we may finish at once this interesting transaction concerning the fettlement of the charters, we shall briefly mention the subsequent events which relate to it. The constable and mareschal, informed of the king's compliance, were fatisfied; and not only ceased from diffurbing the government, but affifted the regency with their power against the Scots, who had rifen in arms, and had thrown off the yoke of England y. But being fensible, that the smallest pretence would suffice to make Edward retract these detested laws, which, though they had often received the fanction both of king and parliament, and had been acknowledged during three reigns, were never yet deemed to have fufficient validity; they infifted, that he should again confirm them on his return to England, and fhould thereby renounce all plea which he might derive from his refiding in a foreign country, when he formerly affixed his feal to them z. It appeared, that they judged aright of Edward's character and intentions: He delayed this confirmation as long as possible; and when the fear of worse consequences obliged him again to comply, he expressly added a falvo for his royal dignity or prerogative, which in effect enervated the whole

* Walfing, p. 74. Heming, vol. i. p. 143, p. 143. Heming, vol. i. p. 159.

y Heming, vol. i.

force of the charters 2. The two earls and their adhe- C H A P. rents left the parliament in difgust; and the king was constrained, on a future occasion, to grant to the people, without any fubterfuge, a pure and absolute confirmation of those laws b, which were so much the object of their passionate affection. Even farther securities were then provided for the establishment of national privileges. Three knights were appointed to be chosen in each county, and were invefted with the power of punishing, by fine and imprisonment, every transgression or violation of the charters c: A precaution, which, though it was foon difused, as encroaching too much on royal prerogative, proves the attachment, which the English in that age bore to liberty, and their well-grounded jealoufy of the arbitrary disposition of Edward.

THE work, however, was not yet entirely finished and complete. In order to execute the leffer charter, it was requifite, by new perambulations, to fet bounds to the royal forests, and to disafforest all land which former encroachments had comprehended within their limits. Edward discovered the same reluctance to comply with this equitable demand; and it was not till after many delays on his part, and many folicitations and requests, and even menaces of war and violence d, on the part of the barons, that the perambulations were made, and exact boundaries fixed, by a jury in each county, to the extent of his forests e. Had not his ambitious and active temper raised him so many foreign enemies, and obliged him to have recourse so often to the affistance of his subjects, it

b Heming. vol. i. p. 168. a Heming. vol. i. p. 167, 168.

d Walfing. p. 80. We are told E Hemingford, vol. i. p. 170. by Tyrrel, vol. ii. p. 145. from the Chronicle of St. Albans, that the barons not content with the execution of the charter of forests, demanded of Edward as high terms as had been imposed on his father by the earl of Leicefter: But no other historian mentions this particular.

c Heming. vol. i. p. 171. M. West. p. 431. 433.

C H A P. is not likely that those concessions could ever have been extorted from him.

1297

Bur while the people, after fo many successful flruggles, deemed themselves happy in the secure possession of their privileges; they were furprized in 1305 to find, that Edward had fecretly applied to Rome, and had procured. from that mercenary court, an absolution from all the oaths and engagements, which he had fo often reiterated, to observe both the charters. There are some historians f so credulous as to imagine, that this perilous step was taken by him for no other purpose than to acquire the merit of granting a new confirmation of the charters, as he did foon after; and a confirmation fo much the more unqueftionable, as it could never after be invalidated by his fucceffors, on pretence of any force or violence which had been imposed upon him. But besides, that this might have been done with a better grace, if he had never applied for any fuch absolution, the whole tenor of his conduct proves him to be little fusceptible of fuch refinements in patriotifm; and this very deed itself, in which he anew confirmed the charters, carries on the face of it a very opposite presumption. Though he ratified the charters in general, he still took advantage of the papal bull so far as to invalidate the late perambulations of the forests, which had been made with fuch care and attention, and to referve to himself the power, in case of savourable incidents, to extend as much as formerly those arbitrary jurisdictions. If the power was not in fact made use of, we can only conclude, that the favourable incidents did not offer.

Thus, after the contests of near a whole century, and these ever accompanied with violent jealousies, often with public convulsions, the Great Charter was finally established; and the English nation have the honour of ex- C H A P. torting, by their perseverance, this concession from the ablest, the most warlike, and the most ambitious of all their princes i. It is computed, that above thirty confirmations of the charter were at different times required of feveral kings, and granted by them, in full parliament; a precaution, which, while it discovers some ignorance of the true nature of law and government, proves a laudable jealoufy of national privileges in the people, and an extreme anxiety, lest contrary precedents should ever be pleaded as an authority for infringing them. Accordingly we find, that, though arbitrary practices often prevailed, and were even able to establish themselves into fettled customs, the validity of the Great Charter was never afterwards formally disputed; and that grant was still regarded as the basis of English government, and the fure rule by which the authority of every custom was to be tried and canvassed. The jurisdiction of the Starchamber, martial law, imprisonment by warrants from the privy-council, and other practices of a like nature, though established for feveral centuries, were scarcely ever allowed by the English to be parts of their constitution: The affection of the nation for liberty still prevailed over all precedent, and even all political reasoning: The exercise of these powers, after being long the source of fecret murmurs among the people, was, in fulness of time, folemnly abolished, as illegal, at least as oppressive, by the whole legislative authority.

f Brady, vol. ii. p. 84. Carte, vol. ii. p. 292.

To return to the period from which this account of the charters has led us: Though the king's impatience to appear at the head of his armies in Flanders made him

i It must however be remarked, that the king never forgave the chief actors in this transaction, and he found means afterwards to oblige both the constable and mareschal to resign their offices into his hands. The former received a new grant of it: But the office of mareschal was given to Thomas of Brotherton, the king's fecond fon.

C H A P. overlook all confiderations, either of domestic discontents or of commotions among the Scots; his embarkation had been fo long retarded by the various obstructions thrown in his way, that he loft the proper feafon for action, and after his arrival made no progress against the enemy. The king of France, taking advantage of his absence, had broken into the Low Countries; had defeated the Flemings in the battle of Furnes; had made himself master of Lisle, St. Omer, Courtrai, and Ypres; and seemed in a situation to take full vengeance on the earl of Flanders, his rebellious vaffal. But Edward, seconded by an English army of 50,000 men (for this is the number affigned by historians k) was able to stop the career of his victories; and Philip, finding all the weak refources of his kingdom already exhausted, began to dread a reverse of fortune, and to apprehend an invasion on France itself. The king of England, on the other hand, disappointed of affistance from Adolph, king of the Romans, which he had purchased at a very high price, and finding many urgent calls for his presence in England, was desirous of ending on any honourable terms a war, which ferved only to divert his force from the execution of more important projects. This disposition in both monarchs soon produced a ceffation of hostilities for two years; and engaged them to submit their differences to the arbitration of pope Boniface.

Boniface was among the last of the fovereign pontiffs 3298. that exercised an authority over the temporal jurisdiction of princes; and these exorbitant pretensions, which he had been tempted to assume from the successful example of his predecessors, but of which the season was now past, involved him in fo many calamities, and were attended with so unfortunate a catastrophe, that they have been fecretly abandoned, though never openly relinquished, by C H A P. his fuccessors in the apostolic chair. Edward and Philip, equally jealous of papal claims, took care to infert in their reference, that Boniface was made judge of the difference by their confent, as a private person, not by any right of his pontificate; and the pope, without feeming to be offended at this mortifying clause, proceeded to give a fentence between them, in which they both acquiefced !. He brought them to agree, that their union should be cemented by a double marriage; that of Edward himself. who was now a widower, with Margaret, Philip's fifter, and that of the prince of Wales, with Isabella, daughter of that monarch m. Philip was likewise willing to restore Guienne to the English, which he had indeed no good pretence to detain; but he infifted, that the Scots and their king, John Baliol, should, as his allies, be comprehended in the treaty, and should be restored to their liberty. The difference, after feveral disputes, was com- Peace with promised, by their making mutual facrifices to each France. other. Edward agreed to abandon his ally the earl of Flanders, on condition that Philip should treat in like manner his ally the king of Scots. The prospect of conquering these two countries, whose situation made them fo commodious an acquisition to the respective kingdoms, prevailed over all other confiderations; and though they were both finally disappointed in their hopes, their conduct was very reconcilable to the principles of an interested policy. This was the first specimen which the Scots had of the French alliance, and which was exactly conformable to what a smaller power must always expect, when it blindly attaches itself to the will and fortunes of a greater. That unhappy people, now engaged in a brave, though unequal contest for their liberties, were

¹ Rymer, vol. ii. p. 817. Heming. vol. i. p. 149. Trivet, p. 310. m Rymer, vol. ii. p. 823.

C H A P. totally abandoned by the ally, in whom they reposed their final confidence, to the will of an imperious conqueror.

Revolt of Scotland.

THOUGH England, as well as other European countries, was, in its ancient state, very ill qualified for making, and still worse for maintaining conquests, Scotland was fo much inferior in its internal force, and was fo ill fituated for receiving foreign fuccours, that it is no wonder Edward, an ambitious monarch, should have cast his eye on fo tempting an acquisition, which brought both fecurity and greatness to his native country. But the instruments, whom he employed to maintain his dominion over the northern kingdom, were not happily chosen; and acted not with the requisite prudence and moderation, in reconciling the Scottish nation to a yoke, which they bore with fuch extreme reluctance. Warrenne, retiring into England, on account of his bad state of health, left the administration entirely in the hands of Ormefby, who was appointed justiciary of Scotland, and Creffingham, who bore the office of treasurer; and a small military force remained, to fecure the precarious authority of those ministers. The latter had no other object than the amassing of money by rapine and injustice: The former distinguished himself by the rigour and severity of his temper: And both of them, treating the Scots as a conquered people, made them fensible, too early, of the grievous fervitude into which they had fallen. As Edward required, that all the proprietors of land should fwear fealty to him; every one, who refused or delayed giving this testimony of submission, was outlawed and imprisoned, and punished without mercy; and the bravest and most generous spirits of the nation were thus exafperated to the highest degree against the English government ".

TH

hit

mable

NO NO

tel

leath

200 dime:

(gan)

福

DOZD

mic

nn

tall

in in enab

mor

his

oth

fw

of

far

th

pa

t

[&]quot; Walfing. p. 70. Heming. vol. i. p. 118. Trivet, p. 299.

THERE was one William Wallace, of a small fortune, C H A P. but descended of an ancient family, in the west of Scotland, whose courage prompted him to undertake, and enabled him finally to accomplish, the desperate attempt of delivering his native country from the dominion of foreigners. This man, whose valorous exploits are the object of just admiration, but have been much exaggerated by the traditions of his countrymen, had been provoked by the infolence of an English officer to put him to death; and finding himself obnoxious on that account to the feverity of the administration, he fled into the woods, and offered himself as a leader to all those whom their crimes, or bad fortune, or avowed hatred of the English, had reduced to a like necessity. He was endowed with gigantic force of body, with heroic courage of mind, with difinterested magnanimity, with incredible patience, and ability to bear hunger, fatigue, and all the feverities of the feafons; and he foon acquired, among those defperate fugitives, that authority, to which his virtues fo justly intitled him. Beginning with small attempts, in which he was always fuccessful, he gradually proceeded to more momentous enterprizes; and he discovered equal caution in fecuring his followers, and valour in annoying the enemy. By his knowledge of the country, he was enabled, when purfued, to enfure a retreat among the moraffes or forests or mountains; and again, collecting his dispersed affociates, he unexpectedly appeared in another quarter, and furprized and routed and put to the fword the unwary English. Every day brought accounts of his great actions, which were received with no less favour by his countrymen than terror by the enemy: All those, who thirsted after military fame, were desirous to partake of his renown: His fuccessful valour seemed to vindicate the nation from the ignominy, into which it had fallen, by its tame submission to the English: And though no nobleman of note ventured as yet to join his party,

C H A P. party, he had gained a general confidence and attachment, which birth and fortune are not alone able to confer.

WALLACE, having, by many fortunate enterprizes, brought the valour of his followers to correspond to his own, resolved to strike a decisive blow against the English government; and he concerted the plan of attacking Ormesby at Scone, and of taking vengeance on him, for all the violence and tyranny, of which he had been guilty. The justiciary, apprized of his intentions, fled hastily into England: All the other officers of that nation imitated his example: Their terror added alacrity and courage to the Scots, who betook themselves to arms in every quarter: Many of the principal barons, and among the rest Sir William Douglas o, openly countenanced Wallace's party: Robert Bruce fecretly favoured and promoted the same cause: And the Scots, shaking off their fetters, prepared themselves to defend, by an united effort, that liberty which they had fo unexpectedly recovered from the hands of their oppressors.

But Warrenne, collecting an army of 40,000 men in the north of England, determined to re-establish his authority; and he endeavoured, by the celerity of his armament and of his march, to compensate for his past negligence, which had enabled the Scots to throw off the English government. He suddenly entered Annandale, and came up with the enemy at Irvine, before their forces were fully collected, and before they had put themselves in a posture of defence. Many of the Scottish nobles, alarmed with their dangerous situation, here submitted to the English, renewed their oaths of fealty, promised to deliver hostages for their good behaviour, and received a pardon for past offences P. Others who had not yet declared themselves, such as the steward of Scotland and the

P27 08

hracin

伽

(evere

lint,

which

Who

By

1728

his

En

fore

par

of

W

Walfing, p. 70. Heming, vol. i. p. 118.
 p. 121, 122,

earl of Lenox, joined, though with reluctance, the Eng. C HAP. lish army; and waited a favourable opportunity for embracing the cause of their distressed countrymen. But Wallace, whose authority over his retainers was more fully confirmed by the absence of the great nobles, perfevered obstinately in his purpose; and finding himself unable to give battle to the enemy, he marched northwards, with an intention of prolonging the war, and of turning to his advantage the fituation of that mountainous and barren country. When Warrenne advanced to Stirling, he found Wallace encamped at Cambuskenneth, on the opposite banks of the Forth; and being continually urged by the impatient Creffingham, who was actuated both by personal and national animofities against the Scots q, he prepared to attack them in that position, which Wallace, no less prudent than courageous, had chosen for his army . In spite of the remonstrances of Sir Richard Lundy, a Scotchman of birth and family, who fincerely adhered to the English, he ordered his army to pass a bridge which lay over the Forth; but he was foon convinced, by fatal experience, of the error of his conduct. Wallace, allowing fuch numbers of the English to pass as he thought proper, attacked them before they were fully formed, put them to rout, pushed part of them into the river, destroyed the rest by the edge of the fword, and gained a complete victory over them s. Among the flain was Creffingham himself, whose memory was fo extremely odious to the Scots, that they flea'd his dead body, and made faddles and girths of his skin'. Warrenne, finding the remainder of his army much difmayed by this misfortune, was obliged again to evacuate the kingdom, and retire into England. The castles of ⁹ Heming. vol. i. p. 127. r On the 11th of September 1297.

⁶ Walfing. p. 73. Heming. vol. i. p. 127, 128, 129. Trivet, p. 307.

E Heming. vol. i. p. 130.

ed, fell foon after into the hands of the Scots.

WALLACE, univerfally revered as the deliverer of his

WALLACE, univerfally revered as the deliverer of his country, now received, from the hands of his followers, the dignity of regent or guardian under the captive Baliol; and finding that the diforders of war, as well as the unfavourable seasons, had produced a famine in Scotland. he urged his army to march into England, to fubfift at the expence of the enemy, and to revenge all past injuries, by retaliating on that hostile nation. The Scots, who deemed every thing possible under such a leader, joyfully attended his call. Wallace, breaking into the northern counties during the winter feafon, laid every place waste with fire and sword; and after extending on all fides, without opposition, the fury of his ravages, as far as the bishopric of Durham, he returned, loaded with fpoils, and crowned with glory, into his own country ". The diforders, which at that time prevailed in England, from the refractory behaviour of the constable and mareschal, made it impossible to collect an army sufficient to resist the enemy, and exposed the nation to this loss and dishonour.

But Edward, who received in Flanders intelligence of these events, and had already concluded a truce with France, now hastened over to England, in certain hopes, by his activity and valour, not only of wiping off this disgrace, but of recovering the important conquest of Scotland, which he always regarded as the chief glory and advantage of his reign. He appeased the murmurs of his people by concessions and promises: He restored to the citizens of London the election of their own magistrates, of which they had been bereaved in the later part of his father's reign: He ordered strict enquiry to be made concerning the corn and other goods, which had been

wien

mth

(Son

2000

ing,

2001

tieva

ad

Rept

to

de

9

0

violently feized before his departure, as if he intended to C H A P. pay the value to the owners w: And making public professions of confirming and observing the charters, he regained the confidence of the discontented nobles. Having by all these popular arts rendered himself entirely master of his people, he collected the whole military force of England, Wales, and Ireland; and marched with an army of near a hundred thousand combatants to the northern frontiers.

NOTHING could have enabled the Scots to refift, but for one feafon, fo mighty a power, except an entire union among themselves; but as they were deprived of their king, whose personal qualities, even when he was prefent, appeared so contemptible, and had left among his fubjects no principle of attachment to him or his family; factions, jealousies, and animosities unavoidably arose among the great, and distracted all their councils. The elevation of Wallace, though purchased by so great merit, and fuch eminent fervices, was the object of envy to the nobility, who repined to fee a private gentleman raifed above them by his rank, and still more by his glory and reputation. Wallace himself, sensible of their jealousy, and dreading the ruin of his country from those intestine difcords, voluntarily refigned his authority, and retained only the command over that body of his followers, who, being accustomed to victory under his standard, refused to follow into the field any other leader. The chief power devolved on the steward of Scotland, and Cummin of Badenoch; men of eminent birth, under whom the great chieftains were more willing to ferve in defence of their country. The two Scottish commanders, collecting their feveral forces from every quarter, fixed their flation at Falkirk, and purposed there to abide the assault of the English. Wallace was at the head of a third body, placed their pikemen along their front: Lined the intervals between the three bodies with archers: And dreading the great fuperiority of the English in cavalry, endeavoured to secure their front by palisadoes, tied together by ropes *. In this disposition, they expected the approach of the enemy.

zzd July. Battle of Falkirk.

THE king, when he arrived in fight of the Scots, was pleased with the prospect of being able, by one decisive froke, to determine the fortune of the war; and dividing his army also into three bodies, he led them to the attack. The English archers, who began about this time to furpass those of other nations, first chased the Scottish bowmen off the field; then pouring in their arrows among the pikemen, who were cooped up within their intrenchments, threw them into diforder, and rendered the affault of the English pikemen and cavalry more easy and fuccessful. The whole Scottish army was broken, and chased off the field with great slaughter; which the historians, attending more to the exaggerated relations of the populace, than to the probability of things, make amount to fifty or fixty thousand men r. It is only certain, that the Scots never suffered a greater loss in any action, nor one which feemed to threaten more inevitable ruin to their country.

In this general rout of the army, Wallace's military skill and presence of mind enabled him to keep his troops entire; and retiring behind the Carron, he marched leifurely along the banks of that small river, which protected him from the enemy. Young Bruce, who had already given many proofs of his aspiring genius, but who served hitherto in the English army, appeared on the op-

inte 1

x Walfing. p. 75. Heming. vol. i. p. 163.

y Walfing. p. 76. T. Wykes, p. 127. Heming. vol. i. p. 163, 164, 165. Trivet, p. 313, fays only 20,000. M. West. p. 431, fays 40,000.

polite banks; and diftinguishing the Scottish chief, as C H A P. well by his majestic port, as by the intrepid activity of his behaviour, called out to him, and defired a short con-1298. ference. He here represented to Wallace the fruitless and ruinous enterprize in which he was engaged; and endeavoured to bend his inflexible spirit to submission under fuperior power and fuperior fortune: He infifted on the unequal contest between a weak state, deprived of its head and agitated by intestine discord, and a mighty nation, conducted by the ablest and most martial monarch of the age, and possessed of every resource either for protracting the war, or for pushing it with vigour and activity: If the love of his country were his motive for perfeverance, his obstinacy tended only to prolong her misery; if he carried his views to private grandeur and ambition. he might reflect, that, even if Edward should withdraw his armies, it appeared from past experience, that so many haughty nobles, proud of the pre-eminence of their families, would never fubmit to personal merit, whose fuperiority they were less inclined to regard as an object of admiration, than as a reproach and injury to themselves. To these exhortations Wallace replied, that, if he had hitherto acted alone, as the champion of his country, it was folely because no second or competitor, or what he rather wished, no leader had yet appeared to place himself in that honourable station: That the blame lay entirely on the nobility, and chiefly on Bruce himfelf, who, uniting personal merit to dignity of family, had deserted the post, which both nature and fortune, by fuch powerful calls, invited him to assume: That the Scots, possessed of fuch a head, would, by their unanimity and concord, have furmounted the chief difficulty under which they now laboured, and might hope, notwithstanding their present losses, to oppose successfully all the power and abilities of Edward: That Heaven itself could X Vol. II.

CHAP. could not fet a more glorious prize before the eyes either of virtue or ambition, than to join in one object, the acquisition of royalty with the defence of national independance: And that as the interests of his country, more than those of a brave man, could never be fincerely cultivated by a facrifice of liberty, he himself was determined, as far as possible, to prolong, not her misery, but her freedom, and was defirous, that his own life, as well as the existence of the nation, might terminate, when they could no otherwise be preserved than by receiving the chains of a haughty victor. The gallantry of these sentiments, though delivered by an armed enemy, struck the generous mind of Bruce: The flame was conveyed from the breaft of one hero to that of another: He repented of his engagements with Edward; and opening his eyes to the honourable path, pointed out to him by Wallace, fecretly determined to feize the first opportunity of embracing the cause, however desperate, of his oppressed country .

1299.

THE fubjection of Scotland, notwithstanding this great victory of Edward, was not yet entirely completed. The English army, after reducing the fouthern provinces, was obliged to retire for want of provisions; and left the northern counties in the hands of the natives. The Scots, no less enraged at their present defeat, than elated by their past victories, still maintained the contest for liberty; but being fully fensible of the great inferiority of their force, they endeavoured, by applications to foreign courts, to procure to themselves some affistance. The supplications of the Scottish ministers were rejected by Philip; but were more fuccessful with the court of Rome. Boniface, pleafed with an occasion of exerting

ett

in

Te

² This flory is told by all the Scotch writers; though it must be owned that Trivet and Hemingford, authors of good credit, both agree that Bruce was not at that time in Edward's army.

his authority, wrote a letter to Edward, exhorting him C H A P. to put a stop to his oppressions on Scotland, and displaying all the proofs, fuch as they had probably been furnished him by the Scots themselves, for the ancient in- again subdependance of that kingdom a. Among other arguments, dued. hinted at above, he mentioned the treaty conducted and finished by Edward himself, for the marriage of his son with the heiress of Scotland; a treaty which would have been abfurd, had he been superior lord of the kingdom, and had possessed by the feudal law the right of disposing of his ward in marriage. He mentioned feveral other striking facts, which fell within the compass of Edward's own knowledge; particularly, that Alexander, when he did homage to the king, openly and expressly declared in his presence, that he swore fealty not for his crown, but for the lands which he held in England: And the pope's letter might have passed for a reasonable one, had he not fubioined his own claim to be liege lord of Scotland; a claim which had not once been heard of, but which, with a fingular confidence, he afferted to be full, entire, and derived from the most remote antiquity. The affirmative style, which had been fo fuccessful with him and his predecessors in spiritual contests, was never before abused after a more egregious manner in any civil controverfy.

THE reply, which Edward made to Boniface's letter, contains particulars, no less singular and remarkable b. He there proves the superiority of England by historical facts, deduced from the period of Brutus, the Trojan, who, he said, sounded the British monarchy in the age of Eli and Samuel: He supports his position by all the events which passed in the island before the arrival of the Romans: And after laying great stress on the extensive dominions

130%

CHAP, and heroic victories of king Arthur, he vouchfafes at last to descend to the time of Edward the elder, with which, in his speech to the states of Scotland, he had chosen to 1301. begin his claim of superiority. He afferts it to be a fact, notorious and confirmed by the records of antiquity, that the English monarchs had often conferred the kingdom of Scotland on their own fubjects; had dethroned these vaffal kings when unfaithful to them; and had fubflituted others in their flead. He displays with great pomp the full and complete homage which William had done to Henry II.; without mentioning the formal abolition of that extorted deed by king Richard, and the renunciation of all future claims of the same nature. Yet this paper he begins with a folemn appeal to the Almighty, the fearcher of hearts, for his own firm perfuafion of the justice of his claim; and no less than a hundred and four barons, affembled in parliament at Lincoln, concur, in maintaining before the pope, under their feals, the validity of these pretensions c. At the same time, however, they take care to inform Boniface, that, though they had juftified their cause before him, they did not acknowledge him for their judge: The crown of England was free and fovereign: They had fworn to maintain all its royal prerogatives, and would never permit the king himfelf,

THAT neglect, almost total, of truth and justice, which sovereign states discover in their transactions with each other, is an evil universal and inveterate; is one great source of the misery to which the human race is continually exposed; and it may be doubted, whether in many instances it be sound in the end to contribute to the interests of those princes themselves, who thus sacrifice were he willing, to relinquish its independancy.

of eq

In me

STAVE

kur

mn

The

Wil

Me

c Rymer, vol. ii. p. 873. Walfing. p. 85. Heming. vol. i, p. 186. Trivet, p. 330. M. West. p. 443.

their integrity to their politics. As few monarchs have C H A P. lain under stronger temptations to violate the principles of equity, than Edward in his transactions with Scotland; 1302. fo never were they violated with lefs fcruple and referve: Yet his advantages were hitherto precarious and uncertain; and the Scots, once roused to arms and enured to war, began to appear a formidable enemy, even to this military and ambitious monarch. They chose John Scotland Cummin for their regent; and not content with main-volts. taining their independance in the northern parts, they made incursions into the fouthern counties, which, Edward imagined, he had totally fubdued. John de Segrave, whom he had left guardian of Scotland, led an army to oppose them; and lying at Roslin near Edinburgh, fent out his forces in three divisions, to provide 24th Feb. themselves with forage and subsistence from the neighbourhood. One party was fuddenly attacked by the regent and Sir Simon Fraser; and being unprepared, was immediately routed and purfued with great flaughter. The few that escaped, flying to the second division, gave warning of the approach of the enemy: The foldiers ran to their arms: And were immediately led on to take revenge for the death of their countrymen. The Scots, elated with the advantage already obtained, made a vigorous impression upon them: The English, animated with a thirst of vengeance, maintained a stout resistance: The victory was long undecided between them; but at last declared itself entirely in favour of the former, who broke the English, and chaced them to the third division, now advancing with a hafty march to support their distressed companions. Many of the Scots had fallen in the two first actions; most of them were wounded; and all of them extremely fatigued by the long continuance of the combat: Yet were they fo transported with success and X 3 military

dued.

enemies.

C H A P. military rage, that, having fuddenly recovered their order, and arming the followers of their camp with the spoils of the flaughtered enemy, they drove with fury upon 1303. the ranks of the difmayed English. The favourable moment decided the battle; which the Scots, had they met with a fleady refiffance, were not long able to maintain: The English were chaced off the field: Three victories were thus gained in one day d: And the renown of these great exploits, feconded by the favourable dispositions of the people, foon made the regent mafter of all the fortreffes in the fouth; and it became necessary for Edward to begin anew the conquest of the kingdom.

THE king prepared himself for this enterprize with his usual vigour and abilities. He assembled both a great fleet and a great army; and entering the frontiers of Scotland. appeared with a force, which the enemy could not think of refisting in the open field: The English navy, which failed along the coast, secured the army from any danger of famine: Edward's vigilance preserved it from furprizes: And by this prudent disposition they marched victorious from one extremity of the kingdom to the other, ravaging the open country, reducing all the caftles e, and receiving the fubmissions of all the nobility, even those of Cummin the regent. The most obstinate resistance was made by the castle of Brechin, defended by Sir Thomas Maule; and the place opened not its gates, till the death of the governor, by difcouraging the garrison, obliged them to submit to the Reagain sub-fate, which had overwhelmed the rest of the kingdom. Wallace, though he attended the English army in their march, found but few opportunities of fignalizing that valour, which had formerly made him fo terrible to his

d Heming, vol. i. p. 197.

e Ibid. p. 205.

EMIS.

557

1200 ploye

tal

letr.

115

mag

COL

OVE

fu

h

EDWARD, having completed his conquest, which em- C H A P. ployed him during the space of near two years, now undertook the more difficult work of fettling the country, 1304. of establishing a new form of government, and of making his acquisition durable to the crown of England. He feems to have carried matters to extremity against the natives: He abrogated all the Scottish laws and customs f: He endeavoured to substitute the English in their place: He entirely razed or destroyed all the monuments of antiquity: Such records or histories as had escaped his former fearch were now burnt or dispersed: And he hastened, by too precipitate steps, to abolish entirely the Scottish name, and to fink it finally in the English.

EDWARD, however, still deemed his favourite conquest exposed to some danger, so long as Wallace was alive: and being prompted both by revenge and policy, he employed every art to discover his retreat, and become master of his person. At last, that hardy warrior, who was determined, amidst the universal slavery of his countrymen, still to maintain his independancy, was betrayed into Edward's hands by Sir John Monteith, his friend, whom he had made acquainted with the place of his concealment. The king, whose natural bravery and magnanimity should have induced him to respect like qualities in an enemy, enraged at some acts of violence committed by Wallace during the fury of war, refolved to overawe the Scots by an example of feverity: He ordered Wallace to be carried in chains to London; to be and August. tried as a rebel and traitor, though he had never made fubmiffions or fworn fealty to England; and to be executed on Tower-hill. This was the unworthy fate of a hero, who, through a course of many years, had, with fignal conduct, intrepidity, and perfeverance, defended,

1305,

against X A

f Ryley, p. 506,

C H A P against a public and oppressive enemy, the liberties of his native country.

But the barbarous policy of Edward failed of the purpose to which it was directed. The Scots, already disgusted at the great innovations introduced by the sword of a conqueror into their laws and government, were farther enraged at the injustice and cruelty exercised upon Wallace; and all the envy, which, during his life-time, had attended that gallant chief, being now buried in his grave, he was universally regarded as the champion of Scotland, and the patron of her expiring independancy. The people, inflamed with resentment, were every where disposed to rise against the English government; and it was not long ere a new and more fortunate leader presented himself, who conducted them to liberty, to victory, and to vengeance.

Robert Bruce.

ROBERT BRUCE, grandfon of that Robert, who had been one of the competitors for the crown, had fucceeded, by his grandfather's and father's death, to all their rights; and the demise of John Baliol, together with the captivity of Edward, eldest son of that prince, feemed to open a full career to the genius and ambition of this young nobleman. He faw, that the Scots, when the title to their crown had expired in the males of their ancient royal family, had been divided into parties nearly equal between the houses of Bruce and Baliol; and that every incident, which had fince happened, had tended to wean them from any attachment to the latter. The slender capacity of John had proved unable to defend them against their enemies: He had meanly refigned his crown into the hands of the conqueror: He had, before his deliverance from captivity, re-iterated that refignation in a manner feemingly voluntary; and had in that deed thrown out many reflections extremely extremely dishonourable to his ancient subjects, whom he C H A P. publicly called traitors, ruffians, and rebels, and with whom, he declared, he was determined to maintain no farther correspondence h: He had, during the time of his exile, adhered frictly to that refolution; and his fon, being a prisoner, seemed ill qualified to revive the rights, now fully abandoned, of his family. Bruce therefore hoped, that the Scots, fo long exposed, from the want of a leader, to the oppressions of their enemies, would unanimously fly to his standard, and would feat him on the vacant throne, to which he brought such plausible pretensions. His aspiring spirit, inflamed by the fervor of youth, and buoyed up by his natural courage, faw the glory alone of the enterprize, or regarded the prodigious difficulties, which attended it, as the fource only of farther glory. The miferies and oppressions, which he had beheld his countrymen fuffer in their unequal contest; the repeated defeats and misfortunes, which they had undergone; proved to him so many incentives to bring them relief, and conduct them to vengeance against the haughty victor. The circumstances, which attended Bruce's first declaration, are variously related; but we shall rather follow the account given by the Scottish historians; not that their authority is in general any-wife comparable to that of the English; but because they may be supposed sometimes better informed concerning facts, which so nearly interested their own nation.

BRUCE, who had long harboured in his breaft the defign of freeing his enflaved country, ventured at last to open his mind to John Cummin, a powerful nobleman, with whom he lived in firict intimacy. He found his friend, as he imagined, fully possessed with the same sentiments; and he needed to employ no arts of perfualion to make him embrace the resolution of throwing off, on the first faE H A P. vourable opportunity, the usurped dominion of the English. But on the departure of Bruce, who attended Edward to London, Cummin, who either had all along $306. diffembled with him, or began to reflect more coolly in his absence on the desperate nature of the undertaking, refolved to atone for his crime in affenting to this rebellion, by the merit of revealing the fecret to the king of England. Edward did not immediately commit Bruce to custody; because he intended, at the same time, to seize his three brothers, who refided in Scotland; and he contented himself with secretly setting spies upon him, and ordering all his motions to be firicily watched. A nobleman of Edward's court, Bruce's intimate friend, was apprized of his danger; but not daring, amidst so many jealous eyes, to hold any conversation with him, he fell on an expedient to give him warning, that it was full time he should make his escape. He sent him, by a fervant, a pair of gilt spurs and a purse of gold, which he pretended to have borrowed from him; and left it to the fagacity of his friend to discover the meaning of the present. Bruce immediately contrived the means of his escape; and as the ground was at that time covered with fnow, he had the precaution, it is faid, to order his horses to be shod with their shoes inverted, that he might deceive those, who should track his path over the open fields or crofs roads, through which he purposed to travel. He arrived in a few days at Dumfries in Annandale, the chief feat of his family interest; and he happily found a great number of the Scottish nobility there affembled, and among the rest, John Cummin, his former affociate.

th Feb.

- THE noblemen were aftonished at the appearance of Bruce among them; and still more when he discovered to them the object of his journey. He told them, that he was come to live or die with them in defence of the liberties

10

berties of his country, and hoped, with their affiftance, C HAP. to redeem the Scottish name from all the indignities, which it had fo long fuffered from the tyranny of their imperious masters: That the facrifice of the rights of his family was the first injury, which had prepared the way for their ensuing flavery; and by refuming them, which was his firm purpose, he opened to them the joyful prospect of recovering from the fraudulent usurper their ancient and hereditary independance: That all past misfortunes had proceeded from their difunion; and they would foon appear no less formidable than of old to their enemies, if they now deigned to follow into the field their rightful prince, who knew no medium between death and victory: That their mountains and their valour, which had, during so many ages, protected their liberty from all the efforts of the Roman empire, would still be fufficient, were they worthy of their generous ancestors, to defend them against the utmost violence of the Englifh tyrant; That it was unbecoming men, born to the most ancient independance known in Europe, to submit to the will of any mafters; but fatal to receive those, who, being irritated by fuch persevering resistance, and inflamed with the highest animosity, would never deem themselves secure in their usurped dominion but by exterminating all the ancient nobility, and even all the ancient inhabitants: And that, being reduced to this desperate extremity, it were better for them at once to perish, like brave men, with fwords in their hands, than to dread long, and at last undergo, the fate of the unfortunate Wallace, whose merits, in the brave and obstinate defence of his country, were finally rewarded by the hands of an English executioner.

THE spirit with which this discourse was delivered, the bold fentiments which it conveyed, the novelty of Bruce's declaration, affifted by the graces of his youth and

CHAP and manly deportment, made deep impression on the minds of his audience, and rouzed all those principles of indignation and revenge, with which they had long been fecretly actuated. The Scottish nobles declared their unanimous resolution to use the utmost efforts in delivering their country from bondage, and to fecond the courage of Bruce, in afferting his and their undoubted rights, against their common oppressors. Cummin alone, who had fecretly taken his measures with the king, opposed this general determination; and by representing the great power of England, governed by a prince of fuch uncommon vigour and abilities, he endeavoured to fet before them the certain destruction, which they must expect, if they again violated their oaths of fealty, and shook off their allegiance to the victorious Edward 1. Bruce, already apprized of his treachery, and foreseeing the certain failure of all his own schemes of ambition and glory from the opposition of so potent a leader, took immediately his resolution; and moved partly by resentment, partly by policy, followed Cummin on the diffolution of the assembly, attacked him in the cloysters of the Grey Friars through which he passed, and running him through the body, left him for dead. Sir Thomas Kirkpatric, one of Bruce's friends, asking him soon after, if the traitor were flain; I believe fo, replied Bruce. And is that a matter, cried Kirkpatric, to be left to conjecture? I will secure him. Upon which he drew his dagger, ran to Cummin, and stabbed him to the heart. This deed of Bruce and his affociates, which contains circumstances justly condemned by our present manners, was regarded in that age, as an effort of manly vigour and just policy. The family of Kirkpatric took for the creft of their arms, which they still wear, a hand with a bloody dagger; and chose for their motto these words, I will secure

1723

100

and

We

him: the expression employed by their ancestor, when he C H A P. executed that violent action.

THE murder of Cummin affixed the feal to the conspiracy of the Scottish nobles: They had now no resource of Scotland. left but to shake off the voke of England, or to perish in the attempt: The genius of the nation rouzed itself from its present dejection: And Bruce, flying to different quarters, excited his partizans to arms, attacked with fuccess the dispersed bodies of the English, got possession of many of the castles, and having made his authority be acknowledged in most parts of the kingdom, was folemnly crowned and inaugurated in the abbey of Scone by the bishop of St. Andrews, who had zealously embraced his cause. The English were again chased out of the kingdom, except fuch as took shelter in the fortresses that still remained in their hands; and Edward found, that the Scots, twice conquered in his reign, and often defeated, must yet be anew subdued. Not discouraged with these unexpected difficulties, he sent Aymer de Valence with a confiderable force into Scotland to check the progress of the malcontents; and that nobleman falling unexpectedly upon Bruce at Methven in Perthshire, threw his army into fuch diforder, as ended in a total defeat k. Bruce fought with the most heroic courage, was thrice difmounted in the action, and as often recovered himfelf; but was at last obliged to yield to superior fortune, and take shelter, with a few followers, in the western isles. The earl of Athole, Sir Simon Fraser, and Sir Christopher Seton, who had been taken prisoners, were ordered by Edward to be executed as rebels and traitors!. Many other acts of rigour were exercised by him; and that prince, vowing revenge against the whole Scottish nation, whom he deemed incorrigible in their aversion to his government, assembled a great army, and k Walfing, p. 91. Heming. vol. i. p. 222, 223. Trivet, p. 344. 1 Heming, vol. i. p. 223. M. West. p. 456.

13070

7th July, Death,

C H A P. was preparing to enter the frontiers, secure of success, , and determined to make the defenceless Scots the victims of his feverity; when he unexpectedly fickened and died near Carlifle; enjoining with his last breath his fon and fuccessor to prosecute the enterprize, and never to desist till he had finally fubdued the kingdom of Scotland. He expired in the fixty-ninth year of his age, and the thirtyfifth of his reign, hated by his neighbours, but extremely respected and revered by his own subjects.

ter of the King.

THE enterprizes, finished by this prince, and the projects, which he formed and brought near to a conclusion, were more prudent, more regularly conducted; and more advantageous to the folid interests of his kingdom, than those which were undertaken in any reign either of his ancestors or his fuccessors. He restored authority to the government, disordered by the weakness of his father; he maintained the laws against all the efforts of his turbulent barons; he fully annexed to his crown the principality of Wales; he took many wife and vigorous measures for reducing Scotland to a like condition; and though the equity of this latter enterprize may reafonably be questioned, the circumstances of the two kingdoms promifed fuch certain fuccefs, and the advantage was fo visible of uniting the whole island under one head; that those who give great indulgence to reasons of state in the measures of princes, will not be apt to regard this part of his conduct with much feverity. But Edward, however exceptionable his character may appear on the head of justice, is the model of a politic and warlike king: He possessed industry, penetration, courage, vigilance, and enterprize: He was frugal in all expences that were not necessary; he knew how to open the public treasures on a proper occasion; he punished criminals with feverity; he was gracious and affable to his fervants and courtiers; and being of a majestic figure, expert in rate th

But

ladre:

当即

min;

曲 mell

Derou

Coke

調

ay n

almi to re

this

den

rent

CEIV

iui

off

CO

fre

all military exercises, and in the main well-proportioned C H A P. in his limbs, notwithstanding the great length and the smallness of his legs, he was as well qualified to captivate the populace by his exterior appearance, as to gain the approbation of men of sense by his more solid virtues.

Bur the chief advantage, which the people of Eng-Miscellaneland reaped, and still continue to reap, from the reign of tions of this this great prince, was the correction, extension, amend-reign. ment, and effablishment of the laws, which Edward maintained in great vigour, and left much improved to posterity: For the acts of a wife legislator commonly remain; while the acquisitions of a conqueror often perish with him. This merit has justly gained to Edward the appellation of the English Justinian. Not only the numerous statutes, passed in his reign, touch the chief points of jurisprudence, and, according to Sir Edward Coke m, truly deserve the name of establishments, because they were more conftant, standing, and durable laws than any made fince; but the regular order, maintained in his administration, gave an opportunity to the common law to refine itself, and brought the judges to a certainty in their determinations, and the lawyers to a precision in their pleadings. Sir Matthew Hale has remarked the fudden improvement of English law during this reign; and ventures to affert, that, till his own time, it had never received any confiderable encrease". Edward fettled the jurisdiction of the several courts; first established the office of justice of peace; abstained from the practice, too common before him, of interrupting justice by mandates from the privy-council o; repressed robberies and diforders:

m Institute, p. 156.

n History of the English law, p. 158. 163.

Articuli super Cart. cap. 6. Edward enacted a law to this purpose; but it is doubtful, whether he ever observed it. We are sure that scarcely any of

his

method of recovering their debts q; and, in short, introduced a new face of things by the vigour and wisdom of his administration. As law began now to be well established, the abuse of that blessing began also to be remarked. Instead of their former associations for robbery and violence, men entered into formal combinations to support each other in law-suits; and it was found requisite to check this iniquity by act of parliament.

THERE happened in this reign a confiderable alteration in the execution of the laws: The king abolished the office of chief justiciary, which, he thought, possessed too much power, and was dangerous to the crown: He completed the division of the court of exchequer into four distinct courts, which managed, each, its several branch, without dependance on any one magistrate; and as the lawyers afterwards invented a method, by means of their fictions, of carrying business from one court to another, the several courts became rivals and checks to each other; a circumstance which tended much to improve the practice of the law in England.

But though Edward appeared thus, throughout his whole reign, a friend to law and justice, it cannot be faid, that he was an enemy to arbitrary power; and in a government more regular and legal than was that of England in his age, such practices, as those which may be remarked in his administration, would have given sufficient ground of complaint, and sometimes were even in his age the his successors did. The multitude of these letters of protection were the ground of a complaint by the commons in 3 Edward II. See Ryley, p. 525. This practice is declared illegal by the statute of Northampton passed in the second of Edward III, but it still continued, like many other abuses. There are instances of it so late as the reign of queen Elizabeth.

P Statute of Winton. 9 Statute of Acton Burnel.

stonce

of law ;

don;

i twe

12003

Dany

lore o

own !

and y

time

Ward

ties,

Wh

^{*} Statute of conspirators.

8 Spelman. Gloss. in verbo jesticia ius.
Gilbert's Hist. of the Exchequer, p. 8.

object of general displeasure. The violent plunder and C H A P. banishment of the Jews; the putting of the whole clergy, at once, and by an arbitrary edict, out of the protection of law; the feizing of all the wool and leather of the kingdom; the heightening of the impositions on the former valuable commodity; the new and illegal commission of Trailbafton; the taking of all the money and plate of monasteries and churches, even before he had any quarrel with the clergy; the subjecting of every man possessed of twenty pounds a year to military fervice, though not bound to it by his tenure; his visible reluctance to confirm the great charter, as if that concession had no validity from the deeds of his predeceffors; the captious clause which he at last annexed to his confirmation; his procuring of the pope's dispensation from the oaths which he had taken to observe that charter; and his levying of talliages at discretion even after the statute, or rather charter. by which he had renounced that prerogative; these are so many demonstrations of his arbitrary disposition, and prove with what exception and referve we ought to celebrate his love of justice. He took care that his subjects should do justice to each other; but he defired always to have his own hands free in all his transactions, both with them and with his neighbours.

The chief obstacle to the execution of justice in those times was the power of the great barons; and Edward was perfectly qualified, by his character and abilities, for keeping these tyrants in awe, and restraining their illegal practices. This salutary purpose was accordingly the great object of his attention; yet was he imprudently led into a measure which tended to encrease and confirm their dangerous authority. He passed a statute, which, by allowing them to entail their estates, made it impracticable to diminish the property of the great families,

C H A P. lies, and left them every means of encrease and acquist-

$307.

EDWARD observed a contrary policy with regard to the church: He seems to have been the first Christian prince that passed a statute of mortmain; and prevented by law the clergy from making new acquifitions of lands, which by the ecclefiaftical canons they were for ever prohibited from alienating. The opposition between his maxims with regard to the nobility and to the ecclefiaftics, leads us to conjecture, that it was only by chance he paffed the beneficial statute of mortmain, and that his fole object was, to maintain the number of knights' fees, and to prevent the fuperiors from being defrauded of the profits of wardship, marriage, livery, and other emoluments arising from the feudal tenures. This is indeed the reason affigned in the statute itself, and appears to have been his real object in enacting it. The author of the annals of Waverly ascribes this act chiefly to the king's anxiety for maintaining the military force of the kingdom; but adds that he was mistaken in his purpose; for that the Amalekites were overcome more by the prayers of Moses than by the fword of the Ifraelites ". The statute of mortmain was often evaded afterwards by the invention of Ules:

EDWARD was active in restraining the usurpations of the church; and excepting his ardour for Crusades, which adhered to him during his whole life, seems, in other respects, to have been little insected with superstition, the vice chiefly of weak minds. But the passion for Crusades was really in that age the passion for glory. As the popenow felt himself somewhat more restrained in his former practice of pillaging the several churches in Europe, by

of part

ward w

wid

Mar

inties

TH

lingdo

hog

The

世0

HATS,

aly i do

ilwa

The

freq

Ret

tag

28

ch

6

t Brady of Boroughs, p. 25, from the records.

u P. 234. See also M. West, p. 409.

13076

laying impositions upon them, he permitted the generals C H A P. of particular orders, who refided at Rome, to levy taxes on the convents subjected to their jurisdiction; and Edward was obliged to enact a law against this new abuse. It was also become a practice of the court of Rome to provide succeffors to benefices before they became vacant: Edward found it likewise necessary to prevent by law this species of injustice.

THE tribute of tooo marks a year, to which king John, in doing homage to the pope, had subjected the kingdom, had been pretty regularly paid fince his time, though the vaffalage was constantly denied, and indeed, for fear of giving offence, had been but little infifted on. The payment was called by a new name of census, not by that of tribute. King Edward seems to have always paid this money with great reluctance, and he suffered the arrears, at one time, to run on for fix years w, at another for eleven *: But as princes in that age stood continually in need of the pope's good offices, for difpensations of marriage and for other concessions, the court of Rome always found means, fooner or later, to catch the money. The levying of first-fruits was also a new device, begun in this reign, by which his holinefs thrust his fingers very frequently into the purfes of the faithful; and the king feems to have unwarily given way to it.

In the former reign, the taxes had been partly fcutages, partly fuch a proportional part of the moveables, as was granted by parliament: In this, scutages were entirely dropped; and the affessment on moveables was the chief method of taxation. Edward in his fourth year had a fifteenth granted him; in his fifth year a twelfth; in his eleventh year a thirtieth from the laity, a twentieth from the clergy; in his eighteenth year a fifteenth; in

C H A P. his twenty-fecond year a tenth from the laity, a fixth from London and other corporate towns, half of their benefices from the clergy; in his twenty-third year an eleventhfrom the barons and others, a tenth from the clergy, a feventh from the burgeffes; in his twenty-fourth year a twelfth from the barons and others, an eighth from the burgesses, from the clergy, nothing, because of the pope's inhibition; in his twenty-fifth year an eighth from the laity, a tenth from the clergy of Canterbury, a fifth from those of York; in his twenty-ninth year a fisteenth from the laity, on account of his confirming the perambulations of the forests; the clergy granted nothing; in his thirtythird year, first a thirtieth from the barons and others, and a twentieth from the burgeffes, then a fifteenth from all his subjects; in his thirty-fourth year a thirtieth from all his fubjects for knighting his eldest fon.

THESE taxes were moderate; but the king had also duties upon exportation and importation granted him from time to time: The heaviest were commonly upon wool. Poundage, or a shilling a pound, was not regularly granted the kings for life till the reign of Henry V.

In 1296, the famous mercantile fociety, called the Merchant Adventurers, had its first origin: It was instituted for the improvement of the woollen manufacture. and the vending of the cloth abroad, particularly at Antwerp y. For the English at this time scarcely thought of any more distant commerce.

THIS king granted a charter or declaration of protection and privileges to foreign merchants, and also ascertained the cuftoms or duties which those merchants were in return to pay on merchandize imported and exported. He promised them security; allowed them a jury on 1000.

oftw

BOY

N

dis

En

me.

y Anderson's history of commerce, vol. i. p. 137.

trials, confifting half of natives, half of foreigners; and C H A P. appointed them a justiciary in London for their protection. But notwithstanding this seeming attention to foreign merchants, Edward did not free them from the cruel hardship, of making one answerable for the debts, and even for the crimes of another, that came from the same country 2. We read of fuch practices among the prefent barbarous nations. The king also imposed on them a duty of two shillings on each tun of wine imported, over and above the old duty; and forty pence on each fack of wool exported, besides half a mark, the former duty a.

In the year 1303, the Exchequer was robbed, and of no less a sum than 100,000 pounds, as is pretended b. The abbot and monks of Westminster were indicted for this robbery, but acquitted. It does not appear, that the king ever discovered the criminals with certainty; though his indignation fell on the society of Lombard merchants, particularly the Frescobaldi, very opulent Florentines.

THE pope having in 1307 collected much money in England, the king enjoined the nuncio not to export it in specie but in bills of exchange c. A proof that commerce was but ill understood at that time.

EDWARD had by his first wife, Eleanor of Castile, four fons; but Edward, his heir and fucceffor, was the only one that furvived him. She also bore him eleven daughters, most of whom died in their infancy: Of the furviving, Joan was married first to the earl of Glocester, and after his death, to Ralph de Monthermer: Margaret espoused John duke of Brabant: Elizabeth espoused first John earl of Holland; and afterwards the earl of Hereford: Mary z Anderson's hift, of commerce, vol. i. p. 146. a Rymer, vol. iv. P. 361. It is the charter of Edw. I. which is there confirmed by Edw. III.

E Rymer, vol. ii. p. 1092: B Rymer, vol. ii. p. 930.

Margaret of France, two fons and a daughter; Thomas created earl of Norfolk, and Marefchal of England; and Edmond who was created earl of Kent by his brother when king. The princess died in her infancy.

CHAP. XIV.

EDWARD II.

Weakness of the king—His passion for favourites
—Piers Gavaston—Discontent of the barons
—Murder of Gavaston—War with Scotland
—Battle of Bannockburn—Hugh le Despenfer—Civil commotions—Execution of the earl of Lancaster—Conspiracy against the king—Insurrection—The king dethroned—Murdered
—His Character—Miscellaneous transactions
in this reign.

HE prepossessions, entertained in favour of young C H A P. Edward, kept the English from being fully sensible of the extreme lofs, which they had fuftained by the death 1307. of the great monarch, who filled the throne; and all men hastened with alacrity to take the oath of allegiance to his fon and fucceffor. This prince was in the twentythird year of his age, was of an agreeable figure, of a mild and gentle disposition, and having never discovered a propenfity to any dangerous vice, it was natural to prognofticate tranquillity and happiness from his government, But the first act of his reign blasted all these hopes, and Weakness shewed him to be totally unqualified for that perilous fitu-of the king. ation, in which every English monarch, during those ages, had, from the unstable form of the constitution, and the turbulent dispositions of the people, derived from it, the misfortune to be placed. The indefatigable Robert Bruce, though his army had been difperfed and he himfelf had been obliged to take shelter in the western isles, remained Y 4

C H A P. remained not long unactive; but before the death of the late king, had fallied from his retreat, had again collected his followers, had appeared in the field, and had obtained 1307. by surprize an important advantage over Aymer de Valence, who commanded the English forces d. He was now become fo confiderable as to have afforded the king of England fufficient glory in fubduing him, without incurring any danger of feeing all those mighty preparations, made by his father, fail in the enterprize. But Edward, instead of pursuing his advantages, marched but a little way into Scotland; and having an utter incapacity, and equal aversion, for all application or serious business, he immediately returned upon his footsteps, and difbanded his army. His grandees perceived from this conduct, that the authority of the crown, fallen into such insolence might be practised by them with impunity. THE next measure, taken by Edward, gave them an for favour- inclination to attack those prerogatives, which no longer Piers Gava. kept them in awe. There was one Piers Gavaston, son of a Gascon knight of some distinction, who had honourably ferved the late king, and who, in reward of his merits, had obtained an establishment for his son in the family of the prince of Wales. This young man foon infinuated himself into the affections of his master, by his agreeable behaviour, and by fupplying him with all those innocent, though frivolous amusements, which suited his capacity and his inclinations. He was endowed with the utmost elegance of shape and person, was noted for a fine mien and easy carriage, distinguished himself in all warlike and genteel exercises, and was celebrated for those quick fallies of wit, in which his countrymen usually excel. By all these accomplishments he gained so entire an ascendant over young Edward, whose heart was strongly feeble hands, was no longer to be dreaded, and that every

His passion fton.

te

disposed to friendship and confidence, that the late king, C H A P. apprehensive of the consequences, had banished him the kingdom, and had, before he died, made his fon promise never to recall him. But no sooner did he find himself master, as he vainly imagined, than he sent for Gavaston; and even before his arrival at court, endowed him with the whole earldom of Cornwal, which had escheated to the crown, by the death of Edmond, son of Richard king of the Romans . Not content with conferring on him those possessions, which had sufficed as an appanage for a prince of the blood, he daily loaded him with new honours and riches; married him to his own niece, fister of the earl of Glocester; and seemed to enjoy no pleasure in his royal dignity, but as it enabled him to exalt to the highest splendor this object of his fond affections.

THE haughty barons, offended at the superiority of a Discontent minion, whose birth, though reputable, they despised, as rons. much inferior to their own, concealed not their discontent; and foon found reasons to justify their animosity in the character and conduct of the man they hated. Inflead of difarming envy by the moderation and modesty of his behaviour, Gavaston displayed his power and influence with the utmost oftentation; and deemed no circumstance of his good fortune fo agreeable as its enabling him to eclipse and mortify all his rivals. He was vain-glorious, profuse, rapacious; fond of exterior pomp and appearance, giddy with prosperity; and as he imagined, that his fortune was now as strongly rooted in the kingdom, as his afcendant was uncontrouled over the weak monarch, he was negligent in engaging partizans, who might fupport his fudden and ill-established grandeur. At all tournaments, he took delight in foiling the English nobility, by his fuperior address: In every conversation, he made

e Rymer, vol. iii. p. 1. Heming. vol. i. p. 243. Walfing: p. 96. them

CHAP. them the object of his wit and raillery: Every day his xiv. renemies multiplied upon him; and naught was wanting but a little time to cement their union, and render it fatal, 1307. both to him and to his-master f.

> IT behoved the king to take a journey to France, both in order to do homage for the dutchy of Guienne, and to espouse the princess Isabella, to whom he had long been affianced, though unexpected accidents had hitherto retarded the completion of the marriages. Edward left Gavaston guardian of the realm h, with more ample powers, than had usually been conferred i; and on his return with his young queen, renewed all the proofs of that fond attachment to the favourite, of which every one fo loudly complained. This princefs was of an imperious and intriguing spirit; and finding, that her hufband's capacity required, as his temper inclined, him to be governed, she thought herself best intitled, on every account, to perform the office, and the contracted a mortal hatred against the person, who had disappointed her in these expectations. She was well pleased, therefore, to fee a combination of the nobility forming against Gavaston, who, fenfible of her hatred, had wantonly provoked her by new infults and injuries.

THOMAS, earl of Lancaster, cousin-german to the king, E308. and first prince of the blood, was by far the most opulent and powerful subject in England, and possessed in his own right, and foon after in that of his wife, heiress of the family of Lincoln, no less than fix earldoms, with a proportionable estate in land, attended with all the jurisdictions and power, which commonly in that age were annexed to landed property. He was turbulent and factious in his disposition; mortally hated the favourite, whose influence over the king exceeded his own; and he foon became the head of that party among the barons, who defired the C H A P. depression of this insolent stranger. The consederated nobles bound themselves by oath to expel Gavaston: Both sides began already to put themselves in a warlike posture: The licentiousness of the age broke out in robberies and other diforders, the usual prelude of civil war: And the royal authority, despised in the king's own hands, and hated in those of Gavaston, became insufficient for the execution of the laws, and the maintenance of peace in the kingdom. A parliament being fummoned at Westminster, Lancaster and his party came thither with an armed retinue; and were there enabled to impose their own terms on the fovereign. They required the banishment of Gavaston, imposed an oath on him never to return, and engaged the bishops, who never failed to interpose in all civil concerns, to pronounce him excommunicated, if he remained any longer in the kingdom i. Edward was obliged to fubmit k; but even in his compliance, gave proofs of his fond attachment to his favourite. Instead of removing all umbrage, by fending him to his own country, as was expected, he appointed him lord lieutenant of Ireland 1, attended him to Briftol on his journey thither, and before his departure conferred on him new lands and riches both in Gascony and England m. Gavaston, who did not want bravery, and possessed talents for war ", acted, during his government, with vigour against some Irish rebels, whom he subdued.

f T. de la More, p. 593. Walfing. p. 97. g T. de la More, p. 593. Trivet, cont. p. 3. h Rymer, h Rymer, vol. iii. p. 47. Ypod.

head

000

MEANWHILE, the king, less shocked with the illegal violence which had been imposed upon him, than unhappy in the absence of his minion, employed every expedient to foften the opposition of the barons to his return; as if success in that point were the chief object of his

I Ibid. k Rymer, vol. iii. p. 80. ? Trivet, cont. p. 5. m Rymer, vol. iii. p. 87. P. 92. Murimuth, p. 39. T. de la More, p. 593.

n Heming. vol. i. p. 248.

C. H. A. P. government. The high office of hereditary steward was conferred on Lancaster: His father-in-law, the earl of Lincoln, was bought off by other concessions: Earl Warrenne was also mollified by civilities, grants, or promises: The insolence of Gavaston, being no longer before men's eyes, was less the object of general indignation: And Edward, deeming matters sufficiently prepared for his purpose, applied to the court of Rome, and obtained for Gavaston a dispensation from that oath, which the barons had compelled him to take, that he would for ever abjure the realm . He went down to Chester, to receive him on his first landing from Ireland; flew into his arms with transports of joy; and having obtained the formal confent of the barons in parliament to his re-establishment, fet no longer any bounds to his extravagant fondness and affection. Gavaston himself, forgetting his past misfortunes, and blind to their causes, resumed the same oftentation and infolence; and became more than ever the object of general detestation among the nobility.

THE barons first discovered their animosity by absenting themselves from parliament; and finding that this expedient had not been fuccefsful, they began to think of employing sharper and more effectual remedies. Though there had scarcely been any national ground of complaint, except fome diffipation of the public treasure: Though all the acts of mal-administration, objected to the king and his favourite, feemed of a nature more proper to excite heart-burnings in a ball or affembly, than commotions in a great kingdom: Yet fuch was the situation of the times, that the barons were determined, and were able, to make them the reasons of a total alteration in the constitution and civil government. Having come to parliament, in defiance of the laws and the king's prohibition, with a numerous retinue of armed followers, they found themselves entirely masters; and they presented a C H A P. petition, which was equivalent to a command, requiring 1308. Edward to devolve on a chosen junto the whole authority both of the crown and of the parliament. The king was obliged to fign a commission, empowering the prelates 16th March. and barons to elect twelve perfons, who fhould, till the term of Michaelmas in the year following, have authority to enact ordinances for the government of the kingdom, and regulation of the king's household; confenting that these ordinances should, thenceforth, and for ever, have the force of laws; allowing the ordainers to form affociations among themselves and their friends, for their firict and regular observance; and all this for the greater glory of God, the fecurity of the church, and the honour and advantage of the king and kingdom P. The barons in return figned a declaration, in which they acknowledged, that they owed these concessions merely to the king's free grace; promifed that this commission should never be drawn into precedent; and engaged, that the power of the ordainers should expire at the time appointed q.

7th Feb.

[·] Rymer, vol. iii. p. 167.

THE chosen junto accordingly framed their ordinances, and presented them to the king and parliament, for their confirmation in the ensuing year. Some of these ordinances were laudable, and tended to the regular execution of justice: Such as those, requiring sheriffs to be men of property, abolishing the practice of issuing privy seals for the suspension of justice, restraining the practice of purveyance, prohibiting the adulteration and alteration of the coin, excluding foreigners from the farms of the revenue, ordering all payments to be regularly made into the exchequer, revoking all late grants of the crown, and giving the parties damages in the case of vexatious prosecutions. But what

P Brady's App, No 50. Heming vol. i, p. 247. Walfing p. 97. Ryley, p. 526. 9 Brady's App, No 51.

chiefly

1317

C H A P. chiefly grieved the king, was the ordinance for the removal of evil counsellors, by which a great number of persons were by name excluded from every office of power and profit; and Piers Gavafton himself was for ever banished the king's dominions, under the penalty, in case of difobedience, of being declared a public enemy. Other persons, more agreeable to the barons, were substituted in all the offices. And it was ordained, that, for the future, all the confiderable dignities in the household, as well as in the law, revenue; and military governments, should be appointed by the baronage in parliament; and the power of making war, or affembling his military tenants, should no longer be vested folely in the king, nor be exercised without the consent of the nobility.

EDWARD, from the fame weakness both in his temper and fituation, which had engaged him to grant this unlimited commission to the barons, was led to give a parliamentary fanction to their ordinances: But as a confequence of the same character, he secretly made a protest against them, and declared, that, fince the commission was granted only for the making of ordinances to the advantage of king and kingdom, fuch articles as should be found prejudicial to both, were to be held as not ratified and confirmed . It is no wonder, indeed, that he retained a firm purpose to revoke ordinances, which had been imposed on him by violence, which entirely annihilated the royal authority, and above all, which deprived him of the company and fociety of a person, whom, by an unufual infatuation, he valued above all the world, and above every confideration of interest or tranquillity.

As foon, therefore, as Edward, removing to York, had freed himself from the immediate terror of the barons' power, he invited back Gavaston from Flanders, which that favourite had made the place of his retreat; and de1

福

r Ryley's Placit: Parl: p. 530. 541.

13120

claring his banishment to be illegal, and contrary to the C H A P. laws and customs of the kingdom's, openly re-instated him in his former credit and authority. The barons, highly provoked at this disappointment, and apprehensive of danger to themselves from the declared animosity of so powerful a minion, faw, that either his or their ruin was now inevitable; and they renewed with redoubled zeal their former confederacies against him. The earl of Lancafter was a dangerous head of this alliance: Guy, earl of Warwic, entered into it with a furious and precipitate paffion: Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford, the constable, and Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, brought to it a great accession of power and interest: Even earl Warrenne deferted the royal cause, which he had hitherto fupported, and was induced to embrace the fide of the confederates : And as Robert de Winchelfey, archbishop of Canterbury, professed himself of the same party, he determined the body of the clergy, and confequently the people, to declare against the king and his minion. So predominant, at that time, was the power of the great nobility, that the combination of a few of them was always able to shake the throne; and such an universal concurrence became irrefistible. The earl of Lancaster fuddenly raifed an army, and marched to York, where he found the king already removed to Newcastle ": He slew thither in pursuit of him; and Edward had just time to escape to Tinmouth, where he embarked, and failed with Gavaston to Scarborough. He left his favourite in that fortress, which, had it been properly supplied with provisions, was deemed impregnable; and he marched forward to York, in hopes of raising an army, which might be able to support him against his enemies. Pembroke was fent by the confederates to beliege the castle of Scars Brady's App. No 53. Walling, p. 98.

w Walfing. p. 101.

t Trivet, cont. p. 4.

XIV. 1312. 19th May.

CHAP. borough; and Gavaston, sensible of the bad condition of his garrison, was obliged to capitulate, and to surrender himself prisoner w. He stipulated, that he should remain in Pembroke's hands for two months; that endeavours should, during that time, be mutually used for a general accommodation; that if the terms proposed by the barons were not accepted, the castle should be restored to him in the fame condition as when he furrendered it; and that the earl of Pembroke, and Henry Piercy should, by contract, pledge all their lands for the fulfilling of these conditions x. Pembroke, now mafter of the person of this public enemy, conducted him to the castle of Dedington, near Banbury; where, on pretence of other business, he left him, protected by a feeble guard y. Warwic, probably in concert with Pembroke, attacked the castle: The garrison refused to make any refistance: Gavaston was yielded up to him, and conducted to Warwic caffle: The earls of Lancaster, Hereford, and Arundel, immediately repaired thither z: And without any regard, either to the laws or the military capitulation, they ordered the head of the obnoxious favourite to be ftruck off, by the hands of the executioner a.

Murder of Gavaston. xft July.

> THE king had retired northward to Berwic, when he heard of Gavaston's murder; and his resentment was proportioned to the affection which he had ever borne him. while living. He threatened vengeance on all the nobility, who had been active in that bloody scene, and he made preparations for war in all parts of England. But being less constant in his enmities than in his friendships, he foon after hearkened to terms of accommodation: granted the barons a pardon of all offences; and as they Ripulated to ask him publicly pardon on their knees b, he

b Ryley, p. 538. Rymer, vol. iii, p. 366.

m

x Rymer, vol. ii. p. 324. w Walfing, p. 101.

y T. de la More, p. 593. Z Dugd. Baron. vol. ii. p. 44. 2 Walfing. p. 101. T. de la More, p. 593. Trivet, coat. p. 9.

13126

was so pleased with these vain appearances of submiss-C H A P. fion, that he feemed to have fincerely forgiven them all past injuries. But as they still pretended, notwithstanding their lawless conduct, a great anxiety for the maintenance of law, and required the establishment of their former ordinances as a necessary security for that purpose; Edward told them, that he was willing to grant them a free and legal confirmation of such of these ordinances as were not entirely derogatory to the prerogative of the crown. This answer was received for the Brefent as fatisfactory. The king's person, after the death of Gavaston, was now become less obnoxious to the public; and as the ordinances, infifted on, appeared to be nearly the same with those which had formerly been extorted from Henry III. by Mountfort, and which had been attended with so many fatal consequences, they were, on that account, demanded with lefs vehemence by the nobility and people. The minds of all men feemed to be much appealed: The animolities of faction no longer prevailed: And England, now united under its head. would henceforth be able, it was hoped, to take vengeance on all its enemies; particularly on the Scots, whose progress was the object of general resentment and indignation.

IMMEDIATELY after Edward's retreat from Scotland, War with Robert Bruce left his fastnesses, in which he intended to Scotland, have sheltered his feeble army; and supplying his defect of ftrength by fuperior vigour and abilities, he made deep impression on all his enemies, foreign and domestic. He chased lord Argyle and the chieftain of the Macdowals from their hills, and made himself entirely master of the high country: He thence invaded with fuccess the Cummins in the low countries of the north: He took the castles of Inverness, Forfar, and Brechin: He daily gained fome new accession of territory; and what was a VOL. II.

of the nobility to his dominion, and inlifted under his frandard every bold leader, whom he enriched by the spoils of his enemies. Sir James Douglas, in whom commenced the greatness and renown of that warlike family, seconded him in all his enterprizes: Edward Bruce, Robert's own brother, distinguished himself by acts of valour: And the terror of the English power being now abated by the feeble conduct of the king, even the Jeast sanguine of the Scots began to entertain hopes of recovering their independence; and the whole kingdom, except a few fortresses, which he had not the means to attack, had acknowledged the authority of Robert.

In this fituation, Edward had found it necessary to grant a truce to Scotland; and Robert fuccessfully employed the interval in confolidating his power, and introducing order into the civil government, disjointed by a long continuance of wars and factions. The interval was very short: The truce, ill observed on both sides, was at last openly violated; and war recommenced with greater fury than ever. Robert, not content with defending himself, had made successful inroads into England, subfisted his needy followers by the plunder of that country, and taught them to despise the military genius of a people, who had long been the object of their terror. Edward, at last, rouzed from his lethargy, had marched an army into Scotland; and Robert, determined not to rifque too much against an enemy so much superior, retired again into the mountains. The king advanced beyond Edinburgh; but being destitute of provisions, and being ill supported by the English nobility, who were then employed in framing their ordinances, he was foon obliged to retreat, without gaining any advantage over the enemy. But the appearing union of all the parties in England,

England, after the death of Gavaston, seemed to restore 6 H A P. that kingdom to its native force, opened again the prospect of reducing Scotland, and promised a happy conclusion to a war, in which both the interests and passions of the nation were so deeply engaged.

13140

EDWARD affembled forces from all quarters, with a view of finishing at one blow this important enterprize. He summoned the most warlike of his vassals from Gascony: He inlisted troops from Flanders and other foreign countries: He invited over great numbers of the disorderly Irish as to a certain prey: He joined to them a body of the Welsh, who were actuated by like motives: And assembling the whole military force of England, he marched to the frontiers with an army, which, according to the Scotch writers, amounted to a hundred thousand men.

THE army, collected by Robert, exceeded not thirty thousand combatants; but being composed of men, who had diffinguished themselves by many acts of valour, who were rendered desperate by their fituation, and who were enured to all the varieties of fortune, they might justly, under fuch a leader, be deemed formidable to the most numerous and best appointed armies. The castle of Stirling, which, with Berwic, was the only fortress in Scotland, that remained in the hands of the English, had long been befieged by Edward Bruce: Philip de Mowbray, the governor, after an obstinate defence, was at last obliged to capitulate, and to promise, that, if, before a certain day, which was now approaching, he were not relieved, he should open his gates to the enemy d. Robert therefore, fensible that here was the ground on which he must expect the English, chose the field of battle with all the skill and prudence imaginable, and made

C H A P. the necessary preparations for their reception. He posted himself at Bannockburn, about two miles from Stirling; where he had a hill on his right flank, and a morass on his left: And not content with having taken these precautions to prevent his being furrounded by the more numerous army of the English; he foresaw the superior strength of the enemy in cavalry, and made provision against it. Having a rivulet in front, he commanded deep pits to be dug along its banks, and fharp stakes to be planted in them; and he ordered the whole to be carefully covered over with turf d. The English arrived in fight on the evening, and a bloody conflict immediately enfued between two bodies of cavalry; where Robert, who was at the head of the Scots, engaged in fingle combat with Henry de Bohun, a gentleman of the family of Hereford; and at one stroke cleft his adversary to the chin with a battle-ax, in fight of the two armies. The English horse fled with precipitation to their main body.

Battle of Bannockburn.

THE Scots, encouraged by this favourable event, and glorying in the valour of their prince, prognosticated a happy issue to the combat on the ensuing day: The English, confident in their numbers, and elated with former fuccesses, longed for an opportunity of revenge: And the night, though extremely short in that season and 25th June. in that climate, appeared tedious to the impatience of the feveral combatants. Early in the morning, Edward drew out his army, and advanced towards the Scots. The earl of Glocester, his nephew, who commanded the left wing of the cavalry, impelled by the ardour of youth, rushed on to the attack without precaution, and fell among the covered pits, which had been prepared by Bruce for the reception of the enemy . This body of horse was disordered: Glocester himself was overthrown and flain: Sir James Douglas, who commanded the Scot-

d T. de la More, p. 594. C Ibid.

13:4.

tish cavalry, gave the enemy no leifure to rally, but C H A P. pushed them off the field with considerable loss, and purfued them in fight of their whole line of infantry. While the English army were alarmed with this unfortunate beginning of the action, which commonly proves decifive, they observed an army on the heights towards the left, which feemed to be marching leifurely in order to furround them; and they were distracted by their multiplied fears. This was a number of waggoners and fumpter boys, whom Robert had collected; and having supplied them with military standards, gave them the appearance at a distance of a formidable body. The stratagem took effect: A panic feized the English: They threw down their arms and fled: They were purfued with great flaughter, for the space of ninety miles, till they reached Berwic: And the Scots, besides an inestimable booty, took many perfons of quality prisoners, and above 400 gentlemen, whom Robert treated with great humanity f, and whose ransom was a new accession of wealth to the victorious army. The king himfelf narrowly escaped by taking shelter in Dunbar, whose gates were opened to him by the earl of March; and he thence passed by sea to Berwic.

Such was the great and decifive battle of Bannockburn, which secured the independance of Scotland, fixed Bruce on the throne of that kingdom, and may be deemed the greatest overthrow that the English nation, fince the conquest, has ever received. The number of slain on those occasions is always uncertain, and is commonly much magnified by the victors: But this defeat made a deep impression on the minds of the English; and it was remarked, that, for fome years, no superiority of numbers could encourage them to keep the field against the Scots. Robert, in order to avail himself of his present

C H A P. success, entered England, and ravaged all the northern counties without opposition: He besieged Carlisle; but 1314. that place was faved by the valour of Sir Andrew Harcla, the governor: He was more fuccessful against Berwic. which he took by affault: And this prince, elated by his continued prosperity, now entertained hopes of making the most important conquests on the English. He fent $315. over his brother Edward, with an army of 6000 men. into Ireland; and that nobleman affumed the title of King of that island: He himself followed foon after with more numerous forces: The horrible and abfurd oppressions. which the Irish suffered under the English government, made them, at first, sly to the standard of the Scots, whom they regarded as their deliverers : But a grievous famine, which at that time defolated both Ireland and Britain. reduced the Scottish army to the greatest extremities; and Robert was obliged to return, with his forces much diminished, into his own country. His brother, after having experienced a variety of fortune, was defeated and flain near Dundalk by the English, commanded by lord Bermingham: And these projects, too extensive for the force of the Scottish nation, thus vanished into smoke.

EDWARD, besides suffering those disasters from the invasion of the Scots and the insurrection of the Irish, was also insested with a rebellion in Wales; and above all, by the factions of his own nobility, who took advantage of the public calamities, insulted his fallen fortunes, and endeavoured to establish their own independance on the ruins of the throne. Lancaster and the barons of his party, who had declined attending him on his Scottish expedition, no sooner saw him return with disgrace, than they insisted on the renewal of their ordinances, which, they still pretended, had validity; and the king's unhappy situation obliged him to submit to their demands. The ministry was new modeled by the direction of Lancaster 3:

g Ryley, p. 5'o. Rymer, vol. iii. p. 722.

The

1725

time

the

Wes

100

tho

That prince was placed at the head of the council: It C H A P. was declared, that all the offices should be filled, from time to time, by the votes of parliament, or rather, by the will of the great barons h: And the nation, under this new model of government, endeavoured to put itself in a better posture of defence against the Scots. But the factious nobles were far from being terrified with the progrefs of these public enemies: On the contrary, they founded the hopes of their own future grandeur on the weakness and distresses of the crown: Lancaster himself was suspected, with great appearance of reason, of holding a fecret correspondence with the king of Scots: And though he was entrufted with the command of the English armies, he took care that every enterprize should be disappointed, and every plan of operations prove unfuccessful.

ALL the European kingdoms, especially that of England, were at this time unacquainted with the office of a prime minister, so well understood at present in all regular monarchies; and the people could form no conception of a man, who, though still in the rank of a subject, possessed all the power of a fovereign, eased the prince of the burthen of affairs, supplied his want of experience or capacity, and maintained all the rights of the crown, without degrading the greatest nobles by their submission to his temporary authority. Edward was plainly by nature unfit to hold himfelf the reins of government : He had no vices; but was unhappy in a total incapacity for ferious business: He was sensible of his own defects, and necessarily fought to be governed; Yet every favourite, whom he fucceffively chose, was regarded as a fellowsubject, exalted above his rank and station: He was the object of envy to the great nobility: His character and conduct were decryed with the people: His authority

h Brady, vol. ii. p. 122, from the records, app. No. 61, Ryley, p. 560. over Z 4

C H A P. over the king and kingdom was confidered as an usurpation: And unless the prince had embraced the dangerous expedient, of devolving his power on the earl of Lancafter or fome mighty baron, whose family interest was fo extensive as to be able alone to maintain his influence, he could expect no peace or tranquillity upon the throne, Hugh le Despenser.

THE king's chief favourite, after the death of Gavaston, was Hugh le Despenser or Spenser, a young man of English birth, of high rank, and of a noble family !, He possessed all the exterior accomplishments of person and address, which were fitted to engage the weak mind of Edward; but was destitute of that moderation and prudence, which might have qualified him to mitigate the envy of the great, and conduct him through all the perils of that dangerous station, to which he was advanced. His father, who was of the same name, and who, by means of his fon, had also attained great influence over the king, was a nobleman venerable from his years, respected through all his past life for wisdom, valour, and integrity, and well fitted, by his talents and experience, could affairs have admitted of any temperament, to have supplied the defects both of the king and of his minion k. But no fooner was Edward's attachment declared for young Spenfer, than the turbulent Lancaster, and most of the great barons, regarded him as their rival, made him the object of their animofity, and formed violent plans for his ruin 1. They first declared their discontent by withdrawing from parliament; and it was not long ere they found a pretence for proceeding to greater extremities against him.

Civil commotions.

THE king, who fet no limits to his bounty towards his minions, had married the younger Spenfer to his niece, one of the co-heirs of the earl of Glocester, slain at

i Dugd. Baron. vol. i. p. 389. k T. de la More, p. 594. Walfingham. p. 213. T. de la More, p. 595. Murimuth, p. 55. Bannockburn.

Bannockburn. The favourite, by his fuccession to that C H A P. opulent family, had inherited great possessions in the marches of Wales m, and being defirous of extending still farther his influence in those quarters, he is accused of having committed injustice on the barons of Audley and Ammori, who had also married two fifters of the same family. There was likewise a baron in that neighbourhood, called William de Braouse, lord of Gower, who had made a settlement of his estate on John de Mowbray. his fon-in-law; and in case of failure of that nobleman and his iffue, had fubflituted the earl of Hereford, in the fuccession to the barony of Gower. Mowbray, on the decease of his father-in-law, entered immediately in posfession of the estate, without the formality of taking livery and feizin from the crown: But Spenfer, who coveted that barony, perfuaded the king to put in execution the rigour of the feudal law, to feize Gower as escheated to the crown, and to confer it upon him ". This transaction, which was the proper subject of a lawfuit, immediately excited a civil war in the kingdom. The earls of Lancaster and Hereford slew to arms: Audley and Ammori joined them with all their forces: The two Rogers de Mortimer and Roger de Clifford, with many others, difgusted for private reasons at the Spensers. brought a confiderable accession to the party: And their army being now formidable, they fent a message to the king, requiring him immediately to dismiss or confine the younger Spenfer; and menacing him in case of refusal, with renouncing their allegiance to him, and taking revenge on that minister by their own authority. They fcarcely waited for an answer; but immediately fell upon the lands of young Spenser, which they pillaged and destroyed; murdered his servants, drove off his cattle, and burned his houses o. They thence proceeded to m Trivet, cont. p. 25. n Monach, Malmes. o Murimuth,

332I.

CHAP. commit Mke devastations on the estates of Spenser, the father, whose character they had hitherto seemed to refpect. And having drawn and figned a formal affociation among themselves, they marched to London with all their forces, stationed themselves in the neighbourhood of that city, and demanded of the king the banishment of both the Spenfers. These noblemen were then abfent; the father abroad, the fon at fea; and both of them employed in different commissions: The king therefore replied, that his coronation oath, by which he was bound to observe the laws, restrained him from giving his affent to fo illegal a demand, or condemning noblemen who were accused of no crime, nor had any opportunity afforded them of making answer q. Equity and reason were but a feeble opposition to men, who had arms in their hands, and who, being already involved in guilt, faw no fafety but in success and victory. They entered London with their troops; and giving in to the parliament, which was then fitting, a charge against the Spenfers, of which they attempted not to prove one article, they procured, by menaces and violence, a fentence of attainder and perpetual exile against these ministers . This fentence was voted by the lay barons alone: For the commons, though now an estate in parliament, were yet of fo little confideration, that their affent was not demanded; and even the votes of the prelates were neglected amidst the present disorders. The only symptom, which these turbulent barons gave of their regard to law, was their requiring from the king an indemnity for their illegal proceedings ; after which they disbanded their army, and separated, in security, as they imagined, to their feveral castles.

1

mate

test

fiet.

kles

his 700

ear

la

P Tyrrel, vol. ii. p. 280. from the register of C. C. Canterbury. r Tottle's collect. part' 2. p. 50. Walfing. 9 Walfing. p. 114. 2 Tottle's collect, part 2. p. 54. Rymer, vol. iii. p. 114. p. 891.

1321.

THIS act of violence, in which the king was obliged C H A P. to acquiesce, rendered his person and his authority so contemptible, that every one thought himself entitled to treat him with neglect. The queen, having occasion foon after to pass by the castle of Leeds in Kent, which belonged to the lord Badlesmere, desired a night's lodging; but was refused admittance, and some of her attendants, who presented themselves at the gate, were killed t. The infult upon this princefs, who had always endeavoured to live on good terms with the barons, and who joined them heartily in their hatred of the young Spenfer, was an action which no body pretended to justify; and the king thought, that he might, without giving general umbrage, affemble an army, and take vengeance on the offender. No one came to the affistance of Badlesmere; and Edward prevailed ": But having now fome forces on foot, and having concerted measures with his friends throughout England, he ventured to take off the mask, to attack all his enemies, and to recall the two Spenfers, whose fentence he declared illegal, unjust, contrary to the tenor of the Great Charter, passed without the assent of the prelates, and extorted by violence from him and the estate of barons w. Still the commons were not mentioned by either party.

THE king had now got the flart of the barons; an advantage, which, in those times, was commonly decisive: And he haftened with his army to the marches of Wales, the chief feat of the power of his enemies, whom he found totally unprepared for refistance. Many of the barons in those parts endeavoured to appeale him by submission x: Their castles were seized, and their persons committed to custody. But Lancaster, in order to prevent the total ruin

t Rymer, vol. iii. p. 89. Walfing. p. 114, 115. T. de la More, p. 595. w Rymer, vol. iii. u Walfing. p. 115. Murimuth, p. 56. p. 907. T. de la More, p. 595. x Walfing. p. 115. Murimuth, p. 57. of 13220

¥ 222 .

CHAP. of his party, summoned together his vassals and retain. ers; declared his alliance with Scotland, which had long been suspected; received the promise of a reinforcement from that country, under the command of Randolf, earl of Murray, and Sir James Douglas , and being joined by the earl of Hereford, advanced with all his forces against the king, who had collected an army of 30,000 men, and was superior to his enemies. Lancaster posted himself at Burton upon Trent, and endeavoured to defend the passages of the river z: But being disappointed in that plan of operations; this prince, who had no military genius, and whose personal courage was even sufpected, fled with his army to the north, in expectation of being there joined by his Scottish alliesa. He was purfued by the king; and his army diminished daily; till he came to Boroughbridge, where he found Sir Andrew Harcla posted with some forces on the opposite side of the river, and ready to dispute the passage with him. He was repulfed in an attempt which he made to force his way; the earl of Hereford was killed; the whole methMarch, army of the rebels was disconcerted; Lancaster himself was become incapable of taking any measures either for flight or defence; and he was feized without refisfance by Harcla, and conducted to the king b. In those violent times, the laws were fo much neglected on both fides, that, even where they might, without any fenfible inconvenience, have been observed, the conquerors deemed it unnecessary to pay any regard to them. Lancaster, who was guilty of open rebellion, and was taken in arms against his fovereign, instead of being tried by the laws of his country, which pronounced the fentence of death against him, was condemned by a court-martial e, and led to execution. Edward, however little vindictive in 15 112

had be

DEC

TH

681 ncer

31 31

ciec

前

8

y Rymer, vol. iii. p. 958. z Walfing. p. 115. a Ypod. b T. de la More, p. 596. Walfing. p. 116. Neuft. p. 504. F Tyrrel, vol. ii. p. 291, from the records.

his natural temper, here indulged his revenge, and em-C H A P. ployed against the prisoner the same indignities, which had been exercised by his orders against Gavaston. He r322. was clothed in a mean attire, placed on a lean jade with-Execution out a bridle, a hood was put on his head, and in this of the earl posture, attended by the acclamations of the people, this ter. prince was conducted to an eminence near Pomfret, one of his own castles, and there beheaded d.

Thus perished Thomas earl of Lancaster, prince of the blood, and one of the most potent barons that had ever been in England. His public conduct sufficiently discovers the violence and turbulence of his character: His private deportment appears not to have been more innocent: And his hypocritical devotion, by which he gained the favour of the monks and populace, will rather be regarded as an aggravation than an alleviation of his guilt. Badlefmere, Giffard, Barret, Cheyney, Fleming, and about eighteen of the most notorious offenders, were afterwards condemned by a legal trial and were executed. Many were thrown into prison: Others made their escape beyond sea: Some of the king's servants were rewarded from the forfeitures: Harcla received for his fervices the earldom of Carlifle, and a large estate, which he foon after forfeited with his life, for a treafonable correspondence with the king of Scotland. But the greater part of those vast escheats was seized by young Spenfer, whose rapacity was infatiable. Many of the barons of the king's party were digusted with this partial division of the spoils: The envy against Spenser rose higher than ever: The usual insolence of his temper, enflamed by fuccess, impelled him to commit many acts of violence: The people, who always hated him, made him still more the object of aversion: All the relations of the attainted barons and gentlemen fecretly vowed reC H A P. venge: And though tranquillity was in appearance reflored to the kingdom, the general contempt of the king and odium against Spenser, bred dangerous humours, the fource of future revolutions and convulsions.

> In this fituation no fuccess could be expected from foreign wars; and Edward, after making one more fruitless attempt against Scotland, whence he retreated with dishonour, found it necessary to terminate hostilities with that kingdom, by a truce of thirteen years. Robert, though his title to the crown was not acknowledged in the treaty, was fatisfied with enfuring his possession of it during fo long a time. He had repelled with gallantry all the attacks of England: He had carried war both into that kingdom and into Ireland: He had rejected with difdain the pope's authority, who pretended to impose his commands upon him, and oblige him to make peace with his enemies: His throne was firmly established, as well in the affections of his subjects, as by force of arms: Yet there naturally remained fome inquietude in his mind. while at war with a state, which, however at present difordered by faction, was of itself so much an over-match for him both in riches and in numbers of people. And this truce was, at the fame time, the more feafonable for England; because the nation was at that juncture threatened with hostilities from France.

PHILIP the Fair, king of France, who died in 1315, had left the crown to his fon Lewis Hutin, who, after a fhort reign, dying without male iffue, was succeeded by Philip the Long, his brother, whose death soon after made way for Charles the Fair, the youngest brother of that family. This monarch had some grounds of complaint against the king's ministers in Guienne; and as there was no common or equitable judge in that strange species

BOB

POTE

inal

ki

一部

部

e Rymer, vol. iii. p. 1022. Murimuth, p. 60.

1324-

of fovereignty, established by the feudal law, he seemed C H A P. defirous to take advantage of Edward's weakness, and under that pretence, to confiscate all his foreign dominions f. After an embassy by the earl of Kent, the king's brother, had been tried in vain, queen Isabella obtained permission to go over to Paris, and endeavour to adjust, in an amicable manner, the difference with her brother: But while she was making some progress in this negociation. Charles started a new pretension, the justice of which could not be disputed, that Edward himself should appear in his court, and do homage for the fees which he held in France. But there occurred many difficulties in complying with this demand. Young Spenfer, by whom the king was implicitly governed, had unavoidably been engaged in many quarrels with the queen, who aspired to the same influence; and though that artful princess, on her leaving England, had diffembled her animofity, Spenfer, well acquainted with her fecret fentiments, was unwilling to attend his mafter to Paris, and appear in a court, where her credit might expose him to insults, if not to danger. He hesitated no less on allowing the king to make the journey alone; both fearing, left that eafy prince should in his absence fall under other influence, and foreseeing the perils, to which he himself should be exposed, if, without the protection of royal authority, he remained in England, where he was fo generally hated. While these doubts occasioned delays and difficulties, Isabella proposed, that Edward should resign the dominion of Guienne to his fon, now thirteen years of age; and that the prince should come to Paris, and do the homage which every vaffal owed to his superior lord. This expedient, which feemed fo happily to remove all difficulties, was immediately embraced: Spenfer was charmed with the contrivance: Young Edward was fent to Paris: And the life.

1 32 50

Wei

pr

C H A P. ruin, covered under this fatal fnare, was never perceived XIV. or suspected, by any of the English council.

1325.

THE queen on her arrival in France, had there found a great number of English fugitives, the remains of the Lancastrian faction; and their common hatred of Spenser foon begat a fecret friendship and correspondence between them and that princefs. Among the rest was young Roger Mortimer, a potent baron in the Welsh marches, who had been obliged, with others, to make his fubmiffions to the king, had been condemned for high treason; but having received a pardon for his life, was afterwards detained in the Tower, with an intention of rendering his confinement perpetual. He was fo fortunate as to make his escape into France s; and being one of the most considerable persons now remaining of the party, as well as diffinguished by his violent animosity against Spenser, he was eafily admitted to pay his court to queen Ifabella. The graces of his person and address advanced him quickly in her affections: He became her confident and counfellor in all her measures: And gaining ground daily upon her heart, he engaged her to facrifice at last, to het passion, all the sentiments of honour and of sidelity to her husband h. Hating now the man, whom she had injured, and whom she never valued, she entered ardently into all Mortimer's conspiracies; and having artfully gotten into her hands the young prince, and heir of the monarchy. fhe refolved on the utter ruin of the king, as well as of his favourite. She engaged her brother to take part in the fame criminal purpose: Her court was daily filled with the exiled barons: Mortimer lived in the most declared intimacy with her: A correspondence was secretly carried on with the malcontent party in England: And when Edward, informed of those alarming circumstances, required

Conspiracy against the king.

g Rymer, vol. iv. p. 7, 8. 20. T. de la More, p. 596. Walfing. p. 120.

Ypod. Neuft. p. 506.

h T. de la More, p. 598. Murimuth, p. 66.
her

her fpeedily to return with the prince, the publicly reach HAP.

plied, that the would never fet foot in the kingdom, till

Spenfer was for ever removed from his presence and councils: A declaration, which procured her great popularity in England, and threw a decent veil over all her treason-able enterprizes.

EDWARD endeavoured to put himself in a posture of defence 1; but, besides the difficulties arising from his own indolence and slender abilities, and the want of authority, which of confequence attended all his refolutions, it was not eafy for him, in the prefent state of the kingdom and revenue, to maintain a constant force ready to repel an invafion, which he knew not at what time or place he had reason to expect. All his efforts were unequal to the Infurrectraiterous and hostile conspiracies, which, both at home and abroad, were forming against his authority, and which were daily penetrating farther even into his own family. His brother, the earl of Kent, a virtuous but weak prince, who was then at Paris, was engaged by his fifter-in-law, and by the king of France, who was also his cousin-german, to give countenance to the invalion, whose sole object, he believed, was the expulsion of the Spenfers: He prevailed on his elder brother, the earl of Norfolk, to enter secretly into the same defign: The earl of Leicester, brother and heir of the earl of Lancaster, had too many reasons for his hatred of these ministers, to refuse his concurrence. Walter de Reynel, archbishop of Canterbury, and many of the prelates, expressed their approbation of the queen's measures: Several of the most potent barons, envying the authority of the favourite, were ready to fly to arms: The minds of the people, by means of some truths and many calumnies, were ftrongly disposed to the fame party: And there needed but the appearance of the queen and prince, with fuch a body of foreign troops, as i Rymer, vol. iv. p. 184. 188. 225.

VOL. II.

might

C H A P might protect her against immediate violence, to turn all this tempest, so artfully prepared, against the unhappy Edward.

CHARLES, though he gave countenance and affiffance 1326. to the faction, was ashamed openly to support the queen and prince, against the authority of a husband and father; and Isabella was obliged to court the alliance of some other foreign potentate, from whose dominions she might fet out on her intended enterprize. For this purpose, she affianced young Edward, whose tender age made him incapable to judge of the confequences, with Philippa, daughter of the count of Holland and Hainault k; and having, by the open affiftance of this prince, and the fecret protection of her brother, inlifted in her fervice near 3000 men, she fet fail from the harbour of Dort, and landed fafely, and without opposition, on the coast of Suf-24th Sept. folk. The earl of Kent was in her company: Two other princes of the blood, the earl of Norfolk, and the earl of Leicester, joined her soon after her landing with all their followers: Three prelates, the bishops of Ely, Lincoln, and Hereford, brought her both the force of their vaffals and the authority of their character 1: Even Robert de Watteville, who had been fent by the king to oppose her progress in Suffolk, deserted to her with all his forces. To render her cause more favourable, she renewed her declaration, that the fole purpose of her enterprize was to free the king and kingdom from the tyranny of the Spenfers, and of chancellor Baldoc, their creature m. The populace were allured by her specious pretences: The barons thought themselves secure against forseitures by the appearance of the prince in her army:

k T. de la More, p. 598. I Walfing, p. 123. Ypod. Neufl., p. 507. T. de la More, p. 598. Murimuth, p. 66. m Ypod. Neufl., p. 508.

And

wi

tite

And a weak irrefolute king, supported by ministers gene- C H A P. rally odious, was unable to ftem this torrent, which bore with fuch irrefistible violence against him. 1326.

EDWARD, after trying in vain to rouze the citizens of London to some sense of duty n, departed for the west, where he hoped to meet with better reception; and he had no fooner discovered his weakness by leaving the city, than the rage of the populace broke out without controul against him and his ministers. They first plundered, then murdered all those who were obnoxious to them: They feized the bishop of Exeter, a virtuous and loyal prelate. as he was passing through the streets; and having beheaded him, they threw his body into the river o. They made themselves masters of the Tower by surprize; then entered into a formal affociation to put to death, without mercy, every one who should dare to oppose the enterprize of queen Isabella, and of the prince P. A like fpirit was foon communicated to all other parts of England; and threw the few fervants of the king, who still entertained thoughts of performing their duty, into terror and aftonishment.

EDWARD was hotly purfued to Bristol by the earl of Kent, seconded by the foreign forces under John de Hainault. He found himself disappointed in his expectations with regard to the loyalty of those parts; and he passed over to Wales, where, he flatttered himself, his name was more popular, and which he hoped to find uninfected with the contagion of general rage, which had feized the English 9. The elder Spenser, created earl of Winchester. was left governor of the castle of Bristol; but the garrison mutinied against him, and he was delivered into the hands of his enemies. This venerable noble, who had nearly reached his ninetieth year, was instantly, without n Walfing p. 123.

P. 67.

o Walfing. p. 124. T. de la More, p. 599. Murimuth, p. 66. P Walfing. p. 124. 9 Murimuth,

396

death by the rebellious barons: He was hanged on a gib bet; his body was cut in pieces, and thrown to the dogs;

and his head was fent to Winchester, the place whose title he bore, and was there set on a pole, and exposed to the insults of the populace.

THE king, disappointed anew in his expectations of fuccour from the Welsh, took shipping for Ireland; but being driven back by contrary winds, he endeavoured to conceal himself in the mountains of Wales: He was foon discovered, was put under the custody of the earl of Leicester, and was confined in the castle of Kenilworth. The younger Spenfer, his favourite, who also fell into the hands of his enemies, was executed, like his father, without any appearance of a legal trial s: The earl of Arundel, almost the only man of his rank in England, who had maintained his loyalty, was, without any trial, put to death at the instigation of Mortimer: Baldoc, the chancellor, being a priest, could not with fafety be so suddenly dispatched; but being sent to the bishop of Hereford's palace in London, he was there, as his enemies probably forefaw, feized by the populace, was thrown into Newgate, and foon after expired, from the cruel usage which he had received . Even the usual reverence, paid to the facerdotal character, gave way, with every other confideration, to the prefent rage of

The king dethroned.

THE queen, to avail herself of the prevailing delusion, fummoned, in the king's name, a parliament at West-minster; where, together with the power of her army, and the authority of her partizans among the barons, who were concerned to secure their past treasons by commit-r Leland's Coll. vol. i. p. 673. T. de la More, p. 599. Walfing, p. 125.

M. Froiffart, liv. i. chap. 13.

s Walfing, p. 125. Ypod. Neuft.

p. 508.

t Walfing, p. 126. Murimuth, p. 68.

13th Jan.

ting new acts of violence against their sovereign, she ex-C H A P. pected to be seconded by the fury of the populace, the most dangerous of all instruments, and the least answerable for their excesses. A charge was drawn up against the king, in which, even though it was framed by his inveterate enemies, nothing but his narrow genius, or his misfortunes, were objected to him: For the greatest malice found no particular crime with which it could reproach this unhappy prince. He was accused of incapacity for government, of wasting his time in idle amusements, of neglecting public business, of being swayed by evil counfellors, of having loft, by his misconduct, the kingdom of Scotland, and part of Guienne; and to swell the charge, even the death of fome barons, and the imprisonment of some prelates, convicted of treason, were laid to his account ". It was in vain, amidst the violence of arms and tumult of the people, to appeal either to law or to reason: The deposition of the king, without any appearing opposition, was voted by parliament: The prince, already declared regent by his party w, was placed on the throne: And a deputation was fent to Edward at Kenilworth, to require his refignation, which menaces and terror foon extorted from him.

But it was impossible, that the people, however corrupted by the barbarity of the times, still farther enflamed by faction, could for ever remain infensible to the voice of nature. Here, a wife had first deserted, next invaded, and then dethroned her husband; had made her minor fon an instrument in this unnatural treatment of his father; had by lying pretences feduced the nation into a rebellion against their fovereign; had pushed them into violence and cruelties, that had dishonoured them: All those circumstances were so odious in themselves, and u Knyghton, p. 2765, 2766. Brady's App. No. 72.

w Rymer, vol. iv. p. 137. Walfing. p. 125.

1327.

CHAP, formed such a complicated scene of guilt, that the least reflection sufficed to open men's eyes, and make them detest this flagrant irfringement of every public and private duty. The fuspicions which soon arose of Isabella's criminal commerce with Mortimer, the proofs which daily broke out of this part of her guilt, encreased the general abhorrence against her; and her hypocrify, in publicly bewailing with tears the king's unhappy fate x, was not able to deceive even the most stupid and most prejudiced of her adherents. In proportion as the queen became the object of public hatred, the dethroned monarch, who had been the victim of her crimes and her ambition, was regarded with pity, with friendship, with veneration: And men became fensibe, that all his misconduct, which faction had fo much exaggerated, had been owing to the unavoidable weakness, not to any voluntary depravity of his character. The earl of Leicester, now earl of Lancafter, to whose sustody he had been committed, was foon touched with those generous fentiments; and besides using his prisoner with gentleness and humanity, he was fuspected to have entertained still more honourable intentions in his favour. The king, therefore, was taken from his hands, and delivered over to lord Berkeley, and Mautravers, and Gournay, who were entrusted alternately, each for a month, with the charge of guarding him. While he was in the custody of Berkeley, he was still treated with the gentleness due to his rank and his misfortunes; but when the turn of Mautravers and Gournay came, every species of indignity was practifed against him, as if their intention had been to break entirely the prince's spirit, and to employ his forrows and afflictions, instead of more violent and more dangerous expedients, for the instruments of his murder y. It is reported, that one day, when Edward was to be shaved, they ordered x Walfing, p. 126. y Anonymi Hift. p. 838.

grave

Wa

We

cold and dirty water to be brought from the ditch for that C H A P. purpose; and when he defired it to be changed, and was still denied his request, he burst into tears, which bedewed his cheeks; and he exclaimed, that, in spite of their insolence, he should be shaved with clean and warm water 2. But as this method of laying Edward in his grave appeared still too slow to the impatient Mortimer, he fecretly fent orders to the two keepers, who were at his devotion, instantly to dispatch him; and these ruffians contrived to make the manner of his death as cruel and barbarous as possible. Taking advantage of Berkeley's fickness, in whose custody he then was, and who was thereby incapacitated from attending his charge a; they came to Berkeley-castle, and put themselves in possession of the king's person. They threw him on a 21st Sept. The king bed: held him down violently with a table, which they murdered. flung over him; thrust into his fundament a red-hot iron, which they inferted through a horn; and though the outward marks of violence upon his person were prevented by this expedient, the horrid deed was discovered to all the guards and attendants by the fcreams, with which the agonizing king filled the caftle, while his bowels were confuming.

GOURNAY and Mautravers were held in general deteftation; and when the enfuing revolution in England threw their protectors from power, they found it necesfary to provide for their fafety by flyng the kingdom. Gournay was afterwards feized at Marfeilles, delivered over to the fenefchal of Guienne, pit on board a ship with a view of carrying him to England; but he was beheaded at fea, by fecret orders, as was supposed, from fome nobles and prelates in England, anxious to prevent any discovery, which he might make of his accomplices. Mautravers concealed himself for several years in Ger-

Z T. de la More, p. 602. a Cotton's Abridg. p. 8.

C H A P. many; but having found means of rendering some service to Edward III. he ventured to approach his person, threw 1327. himself on his knees before him, submitted to mercy, and received a pardon b.

His charac- IT is not easy to imagine a man more innocent and inoffensive than the unhappy king, whose tragical death we have related; nor a prince less fitted for governing that fierce and turbulent people, subjected to his authority. He was obliged to devolve on others the weight of government, which he had neither ability nor inclination to bear: The same indolence and want of penetration led him to make choice of ministers and favourites, who were not always the best qualified for the trust committed to them: The feditious grandees, pleased with his weakness, yet complaining of it; under pretence of attacking his ministers, insulted his person and invaded his authority: And the impatient populace, mistaking the source of their grievances, threw all the blame upon the king, and encreased the public disorders by their faction and violence. It was in vain to look for protection from the laws, whose voice, always feeble in those times, was not heard amidst the din of arms: What could not defend the king was less able to give shelter to any of the people: The whole machine of government was torne in pieces with fury and violence: And men, instead of regretting the manners of their age, and the form of their constitution, which required the most steady and most skilful hand to conduct them, imputed all errors to the person who had the misfortune to be entrusted with the reins of empire.

But though fuch mistakes are natural and almost unavoidable while the events are recent, it is a shameful delusion in modern historians, to imagine, that all the ancient princes, who were unfortunate in their government, were also tyrannical in their conduct, and that the

200 10d

Con

dli

they atte

CE

b Cotton's Abridg. p. 66. 8r. Rymer, vol. v. p. 6co.

3327.

feditions of the people always proceeded from fome inva- C H A P. fion of their privileges by the monarch. Even a great and a good king was not in that age fecure against faction and rebellion, as appears in the case of Henry II.; but a great king had the best chance, as we learn from the history of the same period, for quelling and subduing them. Compare the reigns and characters of Edward I. and II. The father made feveral violent attempts against the liberties of the people: His barons opposed him: He was obliged, at least found it prudent, to submit: But as they dreaded his valour and abilities, they were content with reasonable satisfaction, and pushed no farther their advantages against him. The facility and weakness of the fon, not his violence, threw every thing into confufion: The laws and government were overturned: An attempt to reinstate them was an unpardonable crime: And no atonement, but the deposition and tragical death of the king himfelf, could give those barons contentment. It is easy to see, that a constitution, which depended so much on the personal character of the prince, must neceffarily, in many of its parts, be a government of will, not of laws. But always to throw, without distinction, the blame of all diforders upon the fovereign, would introduce a fatal error in politics, and serve as a perpetual apology for treason and rebellion: As if the turbulence of the great, and madness of the people, were not, equally with the tyranny of princes, evils incident to human fociety, and no less carefully to be guarded against in every well regulated constitution.

WHILE these abominable scenes passed in England, Miscellanethe theatre of France was stained with a wickedness equally ous transactors. barbarous, and still more public and deliberate. The this reign. order of knights templars had arisen during the first fervour of the Crufades; and uniting the two qualities the most popular in that age, devotion and valour, and exercifing both in the most popular of all enterprizes, the defence

C H A P. fence of the Holy Land, they had made rapid advances in credit and authority, and had acquired, from the piety of 1327.

the faithful, ample possessions in every country of Europe, especially in France. Their great riches, joined to the course of time, had, by degrees, relaxed the severity of these virtues; and the templars had in a great measure lost that popularity, which first raised them to honour and distinction. Acquainted from experience with the fatigues and dangers of those fruitless expeditions to the East, they rather chose to enjoy in ease their opulent revenues in Europe: And being all men of birth, educated, according to the custom of that age, without any tincture of letters, they fcorned the ignoble occupations of a monastic life, and passed their time wholly in the fashionable amusements of hunting, gallantry, and the pleasures of the table. Their rival order, that of St. John of Jerusalem, whose poverty had as yet preserved them from like corruptions, still distinguished themselves by their enterprizes against the Infidels, and succeeded to all the popularity, which was lost by the indolence and luxury of the templars. But though these reasons had weakened the foundations of this order, once so celebrated and revered, the immediate cause of their destruction proceeded from the cruel and vindictive spirit of Philip the Fair, who, having entertained a private difgust against fome eminent templars, determined to gratify at once his avidity and revenge, by involving the whole order in an undiffinguished ruin. On no better information, than that of two knights, condemned by their fuperiors to perpetual imprisonment for their vices and profligacy; he ordered on one day all the templars in France to be committed to prison, and imputed to them such enormous and abfurd crimes, as are fufficient of themselves to destroy all the credit of the accusation. Besides their being univerfally charged with murder, robbery, and

ex

13270

and vices the most shocking to nature; every one, it was C H A P. pretended, whom they received into their order, was obliged to renounce his Saviour, to spit upon the cross s, and to join to this impiety the superstition of worshipping a gilded head, which was fecretly kept in one of their houses at Marseilles. They also initiated, it was faid, every candidate by fuch infamous rites, as could ferve to no other purpose, than to degrade the order in his eyes, and destroy for ever the authority of all his superiors over him d. Above a hundred of these unhappy gentlemen were put to the question, in order to extort from them a confession of their guilt: The more obstinate perished in the hands of their tormentors: Several, to procure immediate ease in the violence of their agonies, acknowledged whatever was required of them: Forged confessions were imputed to others: And Philip, as if their guilt were now certain, proceeded to a confiscation of all their treafures. But no fooner were the templars relieved from their tortures, than, preferring the most cruel execution to a life with infamy, they difavowed their confessions, exclaimed against the forgeries, justified the innocence of their order, and appealed to all the gallant actions, performed by them in ancient or later times, as a full apology for their conduct. The tyrant, enraged at this disappointment, and thinking himself now engaged in honour to proceed to extremities, ordered fifty-four of them, whom he branded as relapfed heretics, to perish by the punishment of fire in his capital: Great numbers expired after a like manner in other parts of the kingdom: And when he found, that the perseverance of these unhappy victims, in justifying to the last their innocence, had made deep impression on the spectators, he endeavoured to overcome the constancy of the templars by new inhu-

c Rymer, vol. iii. p. 31. 101.

d It was pretended, that he kiffed the knights who received him on the mouth, navel, and breech. Dupuy, p. 15, 16. Walf. p. 99.

CHAP. manities. The grand master of the order, John de Moday, and another great officer, brother to the fovereign of Dauphiny, were conducted to a scaffold, erected before the church of Notredame, at Paris: A full pardon was offered them on the one hand: The fire, destined for their execution, was flown them on the other: These gallant nobles still persisted in the protestations of their own innocence and that of their order; and were inftantly hurried into the flames by the executioner .

> In all this barbarous injustice, Clement V. who was the creature of Philip, and then refided in France, fully concurred; and without examining a witness, or making any enquiry into the truth of facts, he, fummarily, by the plenitude of his apostolic power, abolished the whole order. The templars all over Europe were thrown into prison; their conduct underwent a strict scrutiny; the power of their enemies still pursued and oppressed them; but no where, except in France, were the smallest traces of their guilt pretended to be found. England fent an ample testimony of their piety and morals; but as the order was now annihilated, the knights were diffributed into feveral convents, and their possessions were, by command of the pope, transferred to the order of St. John f. We now proceed to relate some other detached transactions of the present period.

THE kingdom of England was afflicted with a grievous famine during several years of this reign. Perpetual rains and cold weather, not only destroyed the harvest, but bred a mortality among the cattle, and raifed every kind of food to an enormous price 3. The parliament, in 1315, endeavoured to fix more moderate rates to commodities; not fenfible that fuch an attempt was impracticable, and that, were it possible to reduce the price of provisions

中部

ing

mar

e Vertot, vol. ii. p. 142. f Rymer, vol. iii. p. 323. 956. vol. iv. p. 47. Ypod. Neuft, p. 506. g Trivet, cont. p. 17, 18.

1327.

by any other expedient than by introducing plenty, no-C H A P. thing could be more pernicious and destructive to the public. Where the produce of a year, for instance, falls fo far short, as to afford full subsistance only for nine months, the only expedient for making it last all the twelve, is to raife the prices, to put the people by that means on fhort allowance, and oblige them to fave their food, till a more plentiful feason. But in reality, the encrease of prices is a necessary consequence of scarcity; and laws, instead of preventing it, only aggravate the evil, by cramping and restraining commerce. The parliament accordingly, in the enfuing year, repealed their ordinance, which they had found useless and burdenfome h.

THE prices affixed by the parliament are somewhat remarkable: Three pounds twelve shillings of our present money for the best stalled ox; for other oxen, two pounds eight shillings: A fat hog of two years old, ten shillings: A fat wether unshorn, a crown; if shorn, three shillings and fix-pence: A fat goofe, feven-pence halfpenny: A fat capon, fix-pence: A fat hen, three-pence: Two chickens, three-pence: Four pigeons, three-pence: Two dozen of eggs, three-pence i. If we confider these prices, we shall find, that butcher's meat, in this time of great fcarcity, must still have been fold, by the parliamentary ordinance, three times cheaper than our middling prices at present: Poultry somewhat lower; because, being now confidered as a delicacy, it has rifen beyond its proportion. In the country places of Ireland and Scotland, where delicacies bear no price, poultry is at present as cheap, if not cheaper, than butcher's meat. But the inference I would draw from the comparison of prices is still more confiderable: I suppose that the rates, affixed by h Walf. p. 107. Nest. p. 502.

i Rot. Parl. 7 Edw. II. n. 35, 36. Ypod.

parliament,

CHAP. parliament, were inferior to the usual market prices in those years of famine and mortality of cattle; and that these commodities, instead of a third, had really risen to 1327. a half of the present value. But the famine at that time was fo confuming, that wheat was fometimes fold for above four pounds ten shillings a quarter k, usually for three pounds 1; that is, twice our middling prices. A certain proof of the wretched state of tillage in those ages. We formerly found, that the middling price of corn in that period was half of the prefent price; while the middling price of cattle was only an eighth part: We here find the same immense disproportion in years of scarcity. It may thence be inferred with certainty, that the raifing of corn was a species of manufactory, which few in that age could practife with advantage: And there is reason to think, that other manufactures more refined, were fold even beyond their present prices: At least there is a demonstration for it in the reign of Henry VII. from the rates affixed to scarlet and other broad cloth by act of parliament. During all those times, it was usual for the princes and great nobility to make fettlements of their velvet beds and filken robes, in the fame manner as of their estates and manors m. In the list of jewels and plate, which had belonged to the oftentatious Gavaston, and which the king recovered from the earl of Lancaster after the murder of that favourite, we find some embroidered girdles, flowered shirts, and filk waistcoats ". It was afterwards one article of accusation against that potent and opulent earl, when he was put to death, that he had purloined some of that finery of Gavaston's. The ignorance of those ages in manufactures, and still more, their unskilful husbandry, seem a clear proof that the country was then far from being populous.

low

+

k Murimuth, p. 48. Walfingham, p. 108, fays it rose to fix pounds.

¹ Ypod. Neuft. p. 502. Trivet, cont. p. 18.

m Dugdale passim. n Rymer, vol. iii. p. 388.

1327.

ALL trade and manufactures indeed were then at a very C H A P. low ebb. The only country in the northern parts of Europe, where they feem to have rifen to any tolerable degree of improvement, was Flanders. When Robert, earl of that country, was applied to by the king, and was defired to break off commerce with the Scots, whom Edward called his rebels, and represented as excommunicated on that account by the church, the earl replied, that Flanders was always confidered as common, and free and open to all nations o.

THE petition of the elder Spenfer to parliament, complaining of the devastation committed on his lands by the barons, contains several particulars, which are curious, and discover the manners of the age P. He affirms, that they had ravaged fixty-three manors belonging to him, and he makes his losses amount to 46,000 pounds; that is, to 138,000 of our present money. Among other particulars, he enumerates 28,000 sheep, 1000 oxen and heifers, 1200 cows with their breed for two years, 560 cart horses, 2000 hogs, together with 600 bacons, 80 carcaffes of beef, and 600 muttons in the larder; ten tuns of cyder, arms for 200 men, and other warlike engines and provisions. The plain inference is, that the greater part of Spenser's vast estate, as well as the estates of the other nobility, was farmed by the landlord himfelf, managed by his stewards or bailiffs, and cultivated by his villains. Little or none of it was let on lease to husbandmen: Its produce was confumed in ruftic hospitality by the baron or his officers: A great number of idle retainers, ready for any diforder or mischief, were maintained by him: All who lived upon his estate were absolutely at his disposal: Instead of applying to courts of justice, he usually fought redress by open force and vio-

o Rymer, vol. iii. p. 770. P Brady's hift. vol. ii. p. 143, from (lauf, 1; Edw. II. M. 14. Dors, in cedula,

C H A P. lence: The great nobility were a kind of independant potentates, who, if they fubmitted to any regulations at all, were less governed by the municipal law, than by a rude species of the law of nations. The method, in which we find they treated the king's favourites and minifters, is a proof of their usual way of dealing with each other. A party, which complains of the arbitrary conduct of ministers, ought naturally to affect a great regard for the laws and constitution, and maintain at least the appearance of justice in their proceedings: Yet those barons, when discontented, came to parliament with an armed force, constrained the king to assent to their meafures, and without any trial or witness or conviction, passed, from the pretended notoriety of facts, an act of banishment or attainder against the minister, which, on the first revolution of fortune, was reversed by like expedients. The parliament, during factious times, was nothing but the organ of prefent power. Though the perfons, of whom it was chiefly composed, feemed to enjoy great independance, they really possessed no true liberty; and the fecurity of each individual among them, was not so much derived from the general protection of law, as from his own private power and that of his confederates. The authority of the monarch, though far from absolute, was irregular, and might often reach him: The current of a faction might overwhelm him: A hundred confiderations, of benefits and injuries, friendships and animofities, hopes and fears, were able to influence his conduct; and amidst these motives a regard to equity and law and justice was commonly, in those rude ages, of little moment. Nor did any man entertain thoughts of oppofing present power, who did not deem himself strong enough to dispute the field with it by force, and was not prepared to give battle to the fovereign or the ruling party.

BEFORE

13276

BEFORE I conclude this reign, I cannot forbear making C H A P. another remark, drawn from the detail of losses given in by the elder Spenfer: particularly, the great quantity of falted meat which he had in his larder, 600 bacons, 80 carcasses of beef, 600 muttons. We may observe that the outrage, of which he complained, began after the third of May, or the eleventh new ftyle, as we learn from the same paper. It is easy therefore to conjecture what a vast ftore of the same kind he must have laid up at the beginning of winter; and we may draw a new conclusion with regard to the wretched state of ancient husbandry, which could not provide fubfiftance for the cattle during winter, even in fuch a temperate climate as the fouth of England: For Spenser had but one manor so far north as Yorkshire. There being few or no inclosures, except perhaps for deer, no fown grafs, little hay, and no other refource for feeding cattle; the barons, as well as the people, were obliged to kill and falt their oxen and sheep in the beginning of winter, before they became lean upon the common pasture: A precaution still practifed with regard to oxen in the least cultivated parts of this island. The falting of mutton is a miserable expedient, which has every where been long difused. From this circumstance, however trivial in appearance, may be drawn important inferences, with regard to the domestic economy and manner of life in those ages.

THE diforders of the times, from foreign wars and intestine dissentions, but above all, the cruel famine, which obliged the nobility to dismiss many of their retainers, encreased the number of robbers in the kingdom; and no place was fecure from their incursions s. They met in troops like armies, and over-ran the country. cardinals, themselves, the pope's legates, notwithstanding the numerous train, which attended them, were

s Ypod. Neuft, p. 502. Walf. p. 107. Bb VOL. II.

C H A P. robbed, and despoiled of their goods and equipage, when they travelled on the high-way t.

£327.

Among the other wild fancies of the age, it was imagined, that the perfons affected with leprofy, a difease at that time very common, probably from bad diet, had confpired with the Saracens to poison all the springs and sountains; and men being glad of any pretence to get rid of those who were a burthen to them, many of those unhappy people were burnt alive on this chimerical imputation. Several Jews also were punished in their persons, and their goods were confiscated on the same account v.

STOWE, in his furvey of London, gives us a curious instance of the hospitality of the ancient nobility in this period: It is taken from the accounts of the cofferer or steward of Thomas earl of Lancaster, and contains the expences of that earl during the year 1313, which was not a year of famine. For the pantry, buttery, and kitchen, 3405 pounds. For 369 pipes of red wine, and two of white, 104 pounds, &c. The whole 7309 pounds; that, is near 22,000 pounds of our present money; and making allowance for the cheapness of commodities, near a hundred thousand pounds.

I HAVE feen a French manuscript, containing accounts of some private disbursements of this king. There is an article, among others, of a crown paid to one for making the king laugh. To judge by the events of the reign, this ought not to have been an easy undertaking.

THIS king left four children, two fons and two daughters: Edward, his eldest fon and successor; John, created afterwards earl of Cornwal, who died young at Perth; Jane, afterwards married to David Bruce, king of Scotland; and Eleanor, married to Reginald, count of Gueldres.

t Ypod. Neuft. p. 503. T. de la More, p. 594. Trivet, cont. p. 22. Murimuth, p. 51. u Ypod. Neuft. p. 504.

CHAP XV.

EDWARD III.

War with Scotland—Execution of the Earl of Kent
—Execution of Mortimer, earl of March—
State of Scotland—War with that kingdom—
King's claim to the crown of France—Preparations for war with France—War—Naval victory—Domestic disturbances—Affairs of Britanny—Renewal of the war with France—Invasion of France—Battle of Crecy—War with Scotland—Captivity of the king of Scots—Calais taken.

HE violent party, which had taken arms against C H A P. Edward II. and finally deposed that unfortunate monarch, deemed it requisite for their future security to pay fo far an exterior obeifance to the law, as to defire a 20th Jan. parliamentary indemnity for all their illegal proceedings; on account of the necessity, which, it was pretended, they lay under, of employing force against the Spensers and other evil counsellors, enemies of the kingdom. All the attainders also, which had passed against the earl of Lancaster and his adherents, when the chance of war turned against them, were easily reversed during the triumph of their party w; and the Spenfers, whose former attainder had been reversed by parliament, were now again, in this change of fortune, condemned by the votes of their enemies. A council of regency was likewise appointed by parliament, confifting of twelve persons; five prelates, the archbishops of Canterbury and York,

CHAP. the bishops of Winchesler, Worcester, and Hereford; and feven lay peers, the earls of Norfolk, Kent, and Surrey, and the lords Wake, Ingham, Piercy, and Rofs. The earl of Lancaster was appointed guardian and protector of the king's person. But though it was reasonable to expect, that, as the weakness of the former king had given reins to the licentiousness of the barons, great domestic tranquillity would not prevail during the present minority; the first disturbance arose from an invasion by foreign enemies.

Warwith Scotland.

THE king of Scots, declining in years and health, but retaining still that martial spirit, which had raised his nation from the lowest ebb of fortune, deemed the prefent opportunity favourable for infefting England. He first made an attempt on the castle of Norham, in which he was disappointed; he then collected an army of 25,000 men on the frontiers, and having given the command to the earl of Murray and lord Douglas, threatened an incursion into the northern counties. The English regency, after trying in vain every expedient to restore peace with Scotland, made vigorous preparations for war; and befides affembling an English army of near fixty thousand men, they invited back John Hainault, and some foreign cavalry, whom they had dismissed, and whose discipline and arms had appeared superior to those of their own country. Young Edward himfelf, burning with a passion for military same, appeared at the head of these numerous forces; and marched from Durham, the appointed place of rendezvous, in quest of the enemy, who had already broken into the frontiers, and were laying every thing waste around them.

MURRAY and Douglas were the two most celebrated warriors, bred in the long hosfilities between the Scots and English; and their forces, trained in the same school, and enured to hardships, fatigues, and dangers, were perfectly qualified, by their habits and manner of life, for that defultory and destructive war, which they carried C H A P. into England. Except a body of about 4000 cavalry, well armed, and fit to make a steady impression in battle, the rest of the army were light-armed troops, mounted on fmall horses, which found subsistance every where, and carried them with rapid and unexpected marches, whether they meant to commit depredations on the peaceable inhabitants, or to attack an armed enemy, or to retreat into their own country. Their whole equipage confisted of a bag of oat-meal, which, as a fupply in cafe of neceffity, each foldier carried behind him; together with a light plate of iron, on which he instantly baked the meal into a cake, in the open fields. But his chief subfistance was the cattle which he feized; and his cookery was as expeditious as all his other operations. After fleaing the animal, he placed the skin, loose and hanging in the form of a bag, upon fome stakes; he poured water into it, kindled a fire below, and thus made it ferve as a caldron for the boiling of his victuals x.

1327.

THE chief difficulty which Edward met with, after composing some dangerous frays, which broke out between his foreign forces and the English y, was to come up with an army fo rapid in its marches, and fo little incumbered in its motions. Though the flame and fmoke of burning villages directed him fufficiently to the place of their encampment, he found, upon hurrying thither, that they had already diflodged; and he foon difcovered. by new marks of devastation, that they had removed to some distant quarter. After haraffing his army during fome time in this fruitless chace, he advanced northwards, and croffed the Tyne, with a refolution of awaiting them on their return homewards, and taking vengeance for all their depredations z. But that whole country was already fo much wasted by their frequent incursions, that x Froisfard, liv. iv. chap. 18.

y Ibid. liv. i. chap. 17.

Z Ibid. liv. iv. chap. 19.

C H A P. it could not afford subfishance to his army; and he was obliged again to return fouthwards, and change his plan of operations. He had now loft all track of the enemy; J327. and though he promised the reward of a hundred pounds a year to any one who should bring him an account of their motions, he remained unactive some days, before he received any intelligence of them a. He found at last, that they had fixed their camp on the fouthern banks of the Were, as if they intended to await a battle; but their prudent leaders had chosen the ground with such judgment, that the English, on their approach, faw it impracticable, without temerity, to cross the river in their front, and attack them in their present situation. Edward, impatient for revenge and glory, here fent them a defiance, and challenged them, if they dared, to meet him in an equal field, and try the fortune of arms. The bold spirit of Douglas could ill brook this bravadoe, and he advised the acceptance of the challenge; but he was over-ruled by Murray, who replied to Edward, that he never took the counsel of an enemy in any of his operations. The king, therefore, kept still his position oppofite to the Scots; and daily expected, that necessity would oblige them to change their quarters, and give him an opportunity of overwhelming them with superior forces. After a few days, they fuddenly decamped, and marched farther up the river; but still posted themselves in such a manner, as to preserve the advantage of the ground, if the enemy should venture to attack them b. Edward infifted, that all hazards should be run, rather than allow these ravagers to escape with impunity; but Mortimer's authority prevented the attack, and opposed itself to the valour of the young monarch. While the armies lay in this position, an incident happened which had well nigh proved fatal to the English. Douglas, having gotten the

B Pymer, vol. iv. p. 312. Froiffard, liv. iv. chap. 19.

b Froif-

Word

camp

of to

the

atter

for 1

the

haf

and

ente

only

car

ha

1327.

word, and furveyed exactly the fituation of the English C H A P. camp, entered it fecretly in the night-time, with a body of two hundred determined foldiers, and advanced to the royal tent, with a view of killing or carrying off the king, in the midst of his army. But some of Edward's attendants, awaking in that critical moment, made refulance; his chaplain and chamberlain facrificed their lives for his fafety; the king himfelf, after making a valorous defence, escaped in the dark: And Douglas, having lost the greater part of his followers, was glad to make a hafty retreat with the remainder c. Soon after, the Scottish army decamped without noise in the dead of night; and having thus gotten the start of the English, arrived without farther loss in their own country. Edward, on entering the place of the Scottish encampment, found only fix Englishmen, whom the enemy, after breaking their legs, had tied to trees, in order to prevent their carrying any intelligence to their countrymen d.

THE king was highly incenfed at the disappointment, which he had met with, in his first enterprize, and at the head of fo gallant an army. The fymptoms, which he had discovered of bravery and spirit, gave extreme satisffaction, and were regarded as fure prognoftics of an illuftrious reign: But the general displeasure fell violently on Mortimer, who was already the object of public odium: And every measure, which he pursued, tended to aggravate, beyond all bounds, the hatred of the nation both against him and queen Isabella.

WHEN the council of regency was formed, Mortimer, though in the plenitude of his power, had taken no care to ensure a place in it; but this femblance of moderation was only a cover to the most iniquitous and most ambitious projects. He rendered that council entirely useless by usurping to himself the whole sovereign authority;

c Froiffard, liv. iv. chap. 19. Hemingford, p. 268. Ypod. Neuft p. 509. d Froisfard, liv. iv. chap. 19. Knyghton, p. 2552. B b 4

¥328.

Toyal revenues; he never consulted either the princes of the blood, or the nobility in any public measure; the king himself was so besieged by his creatures, that no access could be procured to him; and all the envy, which had attended Gavaston and Spenser, fell much more defervedly on the new favourite.

MORTIMER, fensible of the growing hatred of the people, thought it requisite, on any terms, to secure peace abroad; and he entered into a negociation with Robert Bruce for that purpose. As the claim of superiority in England, more than any other cause, had tended to inflame the animolities between the two nations, Mortimer, besides stipulating a marriage between Jane, sister of Edward, and David, the fon and heir of Robert, confented to refign absolutely this claim, to give up all the homages done by the Scottish parliament and nobility, and to acknowledge Robert as independant fovereign of Scotland. In return for these advantages, Robert stipulated the payment of 30,000 marks to England. This treaty was ratified by parliament f; but was nevertheless the fource of great discontent among the people, who, having entered zealously into the pretensions of Edward I. and deeming themselves difgraced by the successful refistance made by fo inferior a nation, were disappointed by this treaty, in all future hopes both of conquest and of vengeance.

THE princes of the blood, Kent, Norfolk, and Lancaster, were much united in their councils; and Mortimer entertained great suspicions of their designs against him. In summoning them to parliament, he strictly prohibited them, in the king's name, from coming attended by an armed force, an illegal but usual practice in that age. The three earls, as they approached to

Sali

to

pea

⁸ Rymer, p. 337. Heming, p. 270. Anon, Hift. p. 392. f Ypod. Neuff. p. 519.

Salisbury,

Salisbury, the place appointed for the meeting of parlia-C H A PL ment, found, that, though they themselves, in obedience to the king's command, had brought only their usual retinue with them, Mortimer and his party were attended by all their followers in arms; and they began with fome reason to apprehend a dangerous design against their persons. They retreated, assembled their retainers, and were returning with an army to take vengeance on Mortimer; when the weakness of Kent and Norfolk. who deferted the common cause, obliged Lancaster also to make his submissions s. The quarrel, by the interpofition of the prelates, feemed for the present to be appeased.

BUT Mortimer, in order to intimidate the princes, determined to have a victim; and the fimplicity, with the good intentions of the earl of Kent, afforded him foon after an opportunity of practifing upon him. By himself and his emissaries, he endeavoured to persuade that prince, that his brother, king Edward, was still alive, and detained in fome fecret prison in England. The earl, whose remorfes for the part which he had acted against the late king, probably inclined him to give credit to this intelligence, entered into a defign of restoring him to liberty, of re-inflating him on the throne, and of making thereby fome atonement for the injuries which he himself had unwarily done him h. After this harmless contrivance had been allowed to proceed a certain length, the earl was feized by Mortimer, was accused before the parliament, and condemned by those slavish, though turbulent barons, to lose his life and fortune. The queen oth Marche and Mortimer, apprehensive of young Edward's lenity Execution towards his uncle, hurried on the execution, and the of Kent. prisoner was beheaded next day: But so general was the 1330.

g Knyghton, p. 2554. h Avesbury, p. 8. Anon. Hist. p. 395. affection

282

whi

from

for

of

101

c H A P. affection borne him, and fuch pity prevailed for his unhappy fate, that, though peers had been easily found to condemn him, it was evening before his enemies could find an executioner to perform the office i.

The earl of Lancaster, on pretence of his having affented to this conspiracy, was soon after thrown into prison: Many of the prelates and nobility were prosecuted: Mortimer employed this engine to crush all his enemies, and to enrich himself and his family by the forseitures. The estate of the earl of Kent was seized for his younger son, Geosfrey: The immense fortunes of the Spensers and their adherents were mostly converted to his own use: He affected a state and dignity equal or superior to the royal: His power became formidable to every one: His illegal practices were daily complained of: And all parties, forgetting past animosities, conspired in their hatred of Mortimer.

IT was impossible, that these abuses could long escape the observation of a prince, endowed with so much spirit and judgment as young Edward, who, being now in his eighteenth year, and feeling himfelf capable of governing, repined at being held in fetters by this infolent minister. But so much was he surrounded by the emisfaries of Mortimer, that it behoved him to conduct the project for subverting him, with the same secrecy and precaution, as if he had been forming a conspiracy against his fovereign. He communicated his intentions to lord Mountacute, who engaged the lords Molins and Clifford, Sir John Nevil of Hornby, Sir Edward Bohun, Ufford, and others, to enter into their views; and the caffle of Nottingham was chosen for the scene of the enterprize. The queen-dowager and Mortimer lodged in that fortrefs: The king also was admitted, though with a few only of his attendants: And as the caftle was strictly guarded, the gates locked every evening, and the keys C H A P. carried to the queen, it became necessary to communicate the defign to Sir William Eland, the governor, who $330. zealously took part in it. By his direction, the king's affociates were admitted through a subterraneous passage, which had formerly been contrived for a fecret outlet from the castle, but was now buried in rubbish; and Mortimer, without having it in his power to make refiftance, was fuddenly feized in an apartment adjoining to the queen's k. A parliament was immediately fummoned for his condemnation. He was accused before that affembly of having usurped regal power from the council of regency, appointed by parliament; of having procured the death of the late king; of having deceived the earl of Kent into a conspiracy to restore that prince; of having folicited and obtained exorbitant grants of the royal demesnes; of having diffipated the public treafure; of fecreting 20,000 marks of the money paid by the king of Scotland; and of other crimes and mifdemeanors 1. The parliament condemned him, from the fupposed notoriety of the facts, without trial, or hearing Execution his answer, or examining a witness; and he was hanged of Mortion a gibbet at the Elmes, in the neighbourhood of 29th Nov. London. It is remarkable, that this fentence was near twenty years after reverfed by parliament, in favour of Mortimer's fon; and the reason affigned was the illegal manner of proceeding m. The principles of law and justice were established in England, not in such a degree as to prevent any iniquitous fentence against a person obnoxious to the ruling party; but fufficient, on the return of his credit, or that of his friends, to serve as a reason or pretence for its reverfal.

Heming. p. 271. Ypod. Neuft. p. 510. Knyghton, p. 2555.

k Avefbury, p. 9. 1 Brady's App. No. 83. Anon. Hift. p. 397, 398. Knyghton, p. 2556. m Cotton's Abridg. p. 85, 86.

JUSTICE

of peers, on some of the inferior criminals, particularly on Simon de Bereford: But the Barons, in that act of jurisdiction, entered a protest, that though they had tried Bereford, who was none of their peers, they should not for the future be obliged to receive any such indictment. The queen was confined to her own house at Risings near London: Her revenue was reduced to 4000 pounds a year ": And though the king, during the remainder of her life, paid her a decent visit once or twice a year, she never was able to reinstate herself in any credit or authority.

EDWARD, having now taken the reins of government into his own hands, applied himself, with industry and judgment, to redrefs all those grievances, which had proceeded either from want of authority in the crown, or from the late abuses of it. He issued writs to the judges, enjoining them to administer justice, without paying any regard to arbitrary orders from the ministers: And as the robbers, thieves, murderers, and criminals of all kinds, had, during the course of public convulsions, multiplied to an enormous degree, and were openly protected by the great barons, who made use of them against their enemies. the king, after exacting from the peers a folemn promife in parliament, that they would break off all connexions with fuch malefactors o, fet himself in earnest to remedy the evil. Many of these gangs had become so numerous, as to require his own prefence to disperse them; and he exerted both courage and industry in executing this falutary office. The ministers of justice, from his example, employed the utmost diligence in discovering, pursuing, and punishing the criminals; and this diforder was by degrees corrected, at least palliated; the utmost that could

200

valid

efta

07

re

be expected with regard to a disease, hitherto inherent in C H A P. the constitution.

In proportion as the government acquired authority at 1331. home, it became formidable to the neighbouring nations; and the ambitious spirit of Edward sought, and soon found, an opportunity of exerting itself. The wife and State of valiant Robert Bruce, who had recovered by arms the in-Scatland. dependance of his country, and had fixed it by the last treaty of peace with England, foon after died, and left David his fon, a minor, under the guardianship of Randolf, earl of Murray, the companion of all his victories. It had been stipulated in this treaty, that both the Scottish nobility, who, before the commencement of the wars, enjoyed lands in England, and the English who inherited estates in Scotland, should be restored to their respective possessions P: But though this article had been executed pretty regularly on the part of Edward, Robert, who obferved that the estates, claimed by Englishmen, were much more numerous and valuable than the others, either thought it dangerous to admit fo many fecret enemies into the kingdom, or found it difficult to wrest from his own followers the possessions bestowed on them as the reward of former fervices: And he had protracted the performance of his part of the stipulation. The English nobles, disappointed in their expectations, began to think of a remedy; and as their influence was great in the north, their enmity alone, even though unsupported by the king of England, became dangerous to the minor prince, who succeeded to the Scottish throne.

EDWARD BALIOL, the fon of that John, who was crowned king of Scotland, had been detained fome time a prisoner in England after his father was released; but having also obtained his liberty, he went over to France, that country, without any thoughts of reviving the claims that country, without any thoughts of reviving the claims of his family to the crown of Scotland. His pretentions, however plaufible, had been fo firenuously abjured by the Scots, and rejected by the English, that he was universally regarded as a private person; and he had been thrown into prison on account of some private offence, of which he was accused. Lord Beaumont, a great English baron, who, in the right of his wife, claimed the earldom of Buchan in Scotland q, found him in this situation; and deeming him a proper instrument for his purpose, made such interest with the king of France, who was not aware of the consequences, that he recovered him his liberty, and brought him over with him to England.

1332.

THE injured nobles, possessed of such a head, began to think of vindicating their rights by force of arms; and they applied to Edward for his concurrence and affistance. But there were several reasons, which deterred the king from openly avowing their enterprize. In his treaty with Scotland, he had entered into a bond of 20,000 pounds, payable to the pope, if within four years he violated the peace; and as the term was not yet elapsed, he dreaded the exacting of that penalty by the fovereign pontiff, who possessed so many means of forcing princes to make payment. He was also afraid, that violence and injustice would every where be imputed to him, if he attacked with fuperior force a minor king, and a brotherin-law, whose independant title had so lately been acknowledged by a folemn treaty. And as the regent of Scotland, on every demand which had been made of reftitution to the English barons, had always confessed the justice of their claim, and had only given an evalive anfwer, grounded on plaufible pretences, Edward resolved not to proceed by open violence, but to employ like arti- C H A P. fices against him. He secretly encouraged Baliol in his enterprize; connived at his affembling forces in the north; and gave countenance to the nobles, who were disposed to join in the attempt. A force of near 2500 men was inlifted under Baliol, by Umfreville earl of Angus, the lords Beaumont, Ferrars, Fitz-warin, Wake. Stafford, Talbot, and Moubray. As these adventurers apprehended, that the frontiers would be strongly armed and guarded, they refolved to make their attack by fea; and having embarked at Ravenspur, they reached in a few days the coast of Fife.

13324

SCOTLAND was at that time in a very different fituation from that in which it had appeared under the victorious Robert. Besides the loss of that great monarch, whose genius and authority preserved entire the whole political fabric, and maintained an union among the unruly barons, Lord Douglas, impatient of rest, had gone over to Spain in a crufade against the Moors, and had there perished in battle 1: The earl of Murray, who had long been declining through age and infirmities, had lately died, and had been succeeded in the regency by Donald earl of Marre, a man of much inferior talents: The military spirit of the Scots, though still unbroken, was left without a proper guidance and direction: And a minor king feemed ill qualified to defend an inheritance, which it had required all the confummate valour and abilities of his father to acquire and maintain. But as the Scots were apprized of the intended invasion, great numbers. on the appearance of the English sleet, immediately ran to the shore, in order to prevent the landing of the enemy. Baliol had valour and activity, and he drove back the Scots with confiderable loss . He marched westward

r Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 21. 2. 131. Knyghton, p. 2560,

⁴ Heming, p. 272. Walfing.

C H A P. into the heart of the country; flattering himself that the ancient partizans of his family would declare for him: But the fierce animofities, which had been kindled between the two nations, inspiring the Scots with a strong prejudice against a prince supported by the English, he was regarded as a common enemy; and the regent found no difficulty in affembling a great army to oppose him. It is pretended, that Marre had no less than 40,000 men under his banners; but the same hurry and impatience, that made him collect a force, which from its greatness was fo disproportioned to the occasion, rendered all his motions unskilful and imprudent. The river Erne ran between the two armies; and the Scots, confiding in that fecurity, as well as in their great superiority of numbers, kept no order in their encampment. Baliol passed the river in the night-time; attacked the unguarded and undisciplined Scots; threw them into confusion, which was encreased by the darkness and by their very numbers to which they trusted; and he beat them off the field with great flaughter t. But in the morning, when the Scots were at some distance, they were ashamed of having yielded the victory to fo weak a foe, and they hurried back to recover the honour of the day. Their eager paffions urged them precipitately to battle, without regard to fome broken ground, which lay between them and the enemy, and which disordered and confounded their ranks. Baliol feized the favourable opportunity, advanced his troops upon them, prevented them from rallying, and anew chaced them off the field with redoubled flaughter. There fell above 12,000 Scots in this action; and among these the flower of their nobility; the regent himself, the earl of Carric, a natural fon of their late king, the earls with Aug.

of Athole and Monteith, lord Hay of Errol, constable, and the lords Keith and Lindsey. The loss of the Engparty.

hald .

nne

troi

hish scarcely exceeded thirty men; a strong proof, among C H A P. many others, of the miserable state of military discipline in those ages ".

BALIOL foon after made himfelf mafter of Perth; but still was not able to bring over any of the Scots to his party. Patric Dunbar, earl of March, and Sir Archibald Douglas, brother to the lord of that name, appeared at the head of the Scottish armies, which amounted still to near 40,000 men; and they purposed to reduce Baliol and the English by famine. They blockaded Perth by land; they collected some vessels with which they invested it by water: But Baliol's ships, attacking the Scottish fleet, gained a complete victory; and opened the communication between Perth and the feaw. The Scotch armies were then obliged to difband for want of pay and substiftence: The nation was in effect subdued by a handful of men: Each nobleman, who found himfelf most exposed to danger, successively submitted to Baliol: That prince was crowned at Scone: David, 27th Sept. his competitor, was fent over to France with his betrothed wife, Jane, fifter to Edward: And the heads of his party fued to Baliol for a truce, which he granted them, in order to affemble a parliament in tranquillity, and have his title recognized by the whole Scottish nation.

Bur Baliol's imprudence or his necessities making him dismiss the greater part of his English followers, he was, notwithstanding the truce, attacked of a sudden near Annan by Sir Archibald Douglas, and other chieftains of that party; he was routed; his brother John Baliol was stain; he himself was chaced into England in a

Vol. II.

Cc

miserable

1333-

⁴ Heming. p. 273. Walling. p. 131. Knyghton, p. 2561.

w Heming. p. 273. Knyghton, p. 2561.

1333·

War with Scotland.

C. H. A. P. miserable condition; and thus lost his kingdom by a revolution as sudden as that by which he had acquired it.

WHILE Baliol enjoyed his short-lived and precarious royalty, he had been sensible, that, without the protection of England, it would be impossible for him to maintain possession of the throne; and he had secretly sent a mesfage to Edward, offering to acknowledge his fuperiority, to renew the homage for his crown, and to espouse the princess Jane, if the pope's consent could be obtained, for diffolving her former marriage, which was not yet confummated. Edward, ambitious of recovering that important concession, made by Mortimer during his minority, threw off all fcruples, and willingly accepted the offer; but as the dethroning of Baliol had rendered this stipulation of no effect, the king prepared to re-instate him in poslession of the crown; an enterprize, which appeared from late experience fo easy and so little hazardous. As he possessed many popular arts, he consulted his parliament on the occasion; but that assembly, finding the refolution already taken, declined giving any opinion, and only granted him, in order to support the enterprize. an aid of a fifteenth, from the personal estates of the nobility and gentry, and a tenth of the moveables of boroughs. And they added a petition, that the king would thenceforth live on his own revenue, without grieving his fubjects by illegal taxes, or by the outrageous feizure of their goods in the shape of purveyance x.

As the Scots expected, that the chief brunt of the war would fall upon Berwic, Douglas, the regent, threw a strong garrison into that place under the command of Sir William Keith, and he himself assembled a great army on the frontiers, ready to penetrate into England, as soon as Edward should have invested that place. The English x Cotton's Abridg.

HI

en

tro

army was less numerous, but better supplied with arms C H A P. and provisions, and retained in stricter discipline; and the king, notwithstanding the valiant defence made by Keith, 13330. had in two months reduced the garrifon to extremities, and had obliged them to capitulate: They engaged to furrender, if they were not relieved within a few days by their countrymen y. This intelligence, being conveyed to the Scottish army, which was preparing to invade Northumberland, changed their plan of operations, and engaged them to advance towards Berwic, and attempt the relief of that important fortress. Douglas, who had ever purposed to decline a pitched battle, in which he was sensible of the enemy's fuperiority, and who intended to have drawn out the war by fmall skirmishes, and by mutually ravaging each other's country, was forced, by the impatience of his troops, to put the fate of the kingdom upon the event of one day. He attacked the English at Halidown-hill, a 19th July. little north of Berwic; and though his heavy-armed cavalry difmounted, in order to render the action more fleady and desperate, they were received with such valour by Edward, and were so galled by the English archers, that they were foon thrown into diforder, and on the fall of Douglas, their general, were totally routed. whole army fled in confusion, and the English, but much more the Irish, gave little quarter in the pursuit : All the nobles of chief distinction were either slain or taken prifoners: Near thirty thousand of the Scots fell in the action: While the loss of the English amounted only to one knight, one esquire, and thirteen private soldiers: An inequality almost incredible z.

AFTER this fatal blow, the Scottish nobles had no other resource than instant submission; and Edward, leaving a considerable body with Baliol to complete the conquest of

y Rymer, vol. iv. p. 564, 565, 566. 2 Heming. p. 275, 276, 277. Knyghton, p. 2559. Otterborne, p. 115.

England. Baliol was acknowledged king by a parlia 1333. ment affembled at Edinburgh a; the superiority of England was again recognized; many of the Scottish nobilily swore scalty to Edward; and to complete the missortunes of that nation, Baliol ceded Berwic, Dunbar, Roxborough, Edinburgh, and all the south-east counties of Scotland, which were declared to be for ever annexed to the English monarchy b.

IF Baliol, on his first appearance, was dreaded by the 3334· Scots, as an inflrument employed by England for the fubjection of the kingdom, this deed confirmed all their fuspicions, and rendered him the object of universal hatred. Whatever submissions they might be obliged to make, they confidered him, not as their prince, but as the delegate and confederate of their determined enemy: And neither the manners of the age, nor the state of Edward's revenue permitting him to maintain a standing army in Scotland, the English forces were no sooner withdrawn, than the Scots revolted from Baliol, and returned to their former allegiance under Bruce. Sir Andrew Murray, appointed regent by the party of this latter prince, employed with fuccess his valour and activity in many fmall but decifive actions against Baliol; and in a short time had almost wholly expelled him the kingdom. Edward was obliged again to affemble an army and to march into Scotland: The Scots, taught by experience, withdrew into their hills and fastnesses: He destroyed the houses and ravaged the estates of those whom he called rebels: But this confirmed them still farther in their obstinate antipathy to England and to Baliol; and being now rendered desperate, they were ready to take advantage, on the first opportunity, of the retreat of their enemy, and they foon re-conquered their country from the Eng-C H A P. lish. Edward made anew his appearance in Scotland with like fuccess: He found every thing hostile in the kingdom, except the spot on which he was encamped: And though he marched uncontrouled over the low countries, the nation itself was farther than ever from being broken and fubdued. Befides being supported by their pride and anger, passions difficult to tame, they were encouraged, amidst all their calamities, by daily promifes of relief from France; and as a war was now likely to break out between that kingdom and England, they had reason to expect from this incident a great diversion of that force, which had fo long oppreffed and overwhelmed them.

the

WE now come to a transaction, on which depended King's the most memorable events, not only of this long and claim to the active reign, but of the whole English and French his France, tory, during more than a century; and it will therefore be necessary to give a particular account of the springs and causes of it.

IT had long been a prevailing opinion, that the crown of France could never descend to a semale; and in order to give more authority to this maxim, and affign it a determinate origin, it had been usual to derive it from a clause in the Salian Code, the law of an ancient tribe among the Franks: though that clause, when strictly examined, carries only the appearance of favouring this principle, and does not really, by the confession of the best antiquaries, bear the sense commonly imposed upon it. But though positive law feems wanting among the French for the exclusion of females, the practice had taken place; and the rule was established beyond controversy on some ancient as well as fome modern precedents. During the first race of the monarchy, the Franks were so rude and barbarous Cc3

CHAP. barbarous a people, that they were incapable of submitting to a female reign; and in that period of their history 13370 there were frequent instances of kings advanced to royalty in prejudice of females, who were related to the crown by nearer degrees of confanguinity. These precedents, joined to like causes, had also established the male succession in the second race; and though the instances were neither fo frequent nor fo certain during that period, the principle of excluding the female line feems still to have prevailed, and to have directed the conduct of the nation. During the third race, the crown had descended from father to fon for eleven generations, from Hugh Capet to Lewis Hutin; and thus, in fact, during the course of nine hundred years, the French monarchy had always been governed by males, and no female and none who founded his title on a female had ever mounted the throne. Philip the Fair, father of Lewis Hutin, left three fons, this Lewis, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, and one daughter, Isabella, queen of England. Lewis Hutin, the eldest, left at his death one daughter, by Margaret > or a daughter. The queen bore a male, who lived only a few days: Philip was proclaimed king: And as the duke of Burgundy made some opposition, and afferted the rights of his niece, the states of the kingdom, by a folemn and deliberate decree, gave her an exclusion, and declared all females for ever incapable of fucceeding to the crown of France. Philip died after a short reign, leaving three fifter to Eudes, duke of Burgundy; and as his queen was then pregnant, Philip, his younger brother, was appointed regent, till it should appear whether the child proved a son daughters; and his brother, Charles, without dispute or controversy, then succeeded to the crown. The reign of Charles was also short: He left one daughter; but as his queen was pregnant, the next male heir was appointed regent,

regent, with a declared right of succession, if the iffue C H A P. should prove female. This prince was Philip de Valois, cousin German to the deceased king; being the son of Charles de Valois, brother of Philip the Fair. The queen of France was delivered of a daughter: The regency ended; and Philip de Valois was unanimously placed on the throne of France.

THE king of England, who was at that time a youth of fifteen years of age, embraced a notion, that he was intitled, in right of his mother, to the fuccession of the kingdom, and that the claim of the nephew was preferable to that of the cousin german. There could not well be imagined a notion weaker or worse grounded. The principle of excluding females was of old an established opinion in France, and had acquired equal authority with the most express and positive law: It was supported by ancient precedents: It was confirmed by recent instances, folemnly and deliberately decided: And what placed it ftill farther beyond controversy; if Edward was disposed to question its validity, he thereby cut off his own pretensions; fince the three last kings had all left daughters, who were still alive, and who stood before him in the order of succession. He was therefore reduced to affert, that, though his mother, Isabella, was, on account of her fex, incapable of fucceeding, he himself, who inherited through her, was liable to no fuch objection, and might claim by the right of propinquity. But, befides that this pretention was more favourable to Charles, king of Navarre, descended from the daughter of Lewis Hutin, it was so contrary to the established principles of fuccession in every country of Europe b, was fo repugnant to the practice both in private and public inheritances, that no body in France thought of Edward's claim: Philip's title was univerfally recognized : And b Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 4.

c Id. liv. i. chap. 22.

C H A P. he never imagined, that he had a competitor; much lefs, fo formidable a one as the king of England.

Bur though the youthful and ambitious mind of Edward had rashly entertained this notion, he did not think proper to infift on his pretentions, which must have immediately involved him, on very unequal terms, in a dangerous and implacable war with so powerful a monarch. Philip was a prince of mature years, of great experience, and at that time of an established character both for prudence and valour; and by these circumstances, as well as by the internal union of his people, and their acquiescence in his undoubted right, he possessed every advantage above a raw youth, newly raifed, by injuftice and violence, to the government of the most intractable and most turbulent subjects in Europe. But there immediately occurred an incident, which required, that Edward should either openly declare his pretenfions, or for ever renounce and abjure them. He was summoned to do homage for Guienne: Philip was preparing to compel him by force of arms: That country was in a very bad state of desence: And the forfeiture of so rich an inheritance was, by the feudal law, the immediate confequence of his refufing or declining to perform the duty of a vasial. Edward therefore thought it prudent to submit to present neceffity: He went over to Amiens: Did homage to Philip: And as there had arisen some controversy concerning the terms of this fubmission, he afterwards sent over a formal deed, in which he acknowledged that he owed liege homage to France d; which was in effect ratifying, and that in the strongest terms, Philip's title to the crown of that kingdom. His own claim indeed was fo unreafonable, and fo thoroughly difavowed by the whole French

lal e

mi

COVE

d Rymer, vol. iv. p. 477. 481. Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 25. Anon. Hist. p. 394. Walling. p. 130. Murimuth, p. 73.

nation, that to infuft on it was no better than pretending C H A P. to the violent conquest of the kingdom; and it is probable that he would never have farther thought of it, had it not 1337. been for some incidents, which excited an animosity between the monarchs.

ROBERT of Artois was descended from the blood royal of France, was a man of great character and authority, had espoused Philip's fister, and by his birth, talents, and credit was entitled to make the highest figure, and fill the most important offices, in the monarchy. This prince had lost the county of Artois, which he claimed as his birthright, by a fentence, commonly deemed iniquitous. of Philip the Fair; and he was feduced to attempt recovering possession by an action, so unworthy of his rank and character as a forgery o. The detection of this crime covered him with shame and confusion: His brother-inlaw not only abandoned him, but profecuted him with violence: Robert, incapable of bearing difgrace, left the kingdom, and hid himself in the Low Countries: Chaced from that retreat, by the authority of Philip, he came over to England; in spite of the French king's menaces and remonstrances, he was favourably received by Edward f; and was foon admitted into the councils and shared the confidence of that monarch. Abandoning himself to all the movements of rage and despair, he endeavoured to revive the prepossession entertained by Edward in favour of his title to the crown of France, and even flattered him, that it was not impossible for a prince of his valour and abilities, to render his claim effectual. The king was the more disposed to hearken to suggestions of this nature, because he had, in several particulars, found reason to complain of Philip's conduct with regard to Guienne, and because that prince had both given protection fard, liv. I, chap. 27.

e Froiffard, liv. 1. chap. 29. f Rymer, vol. iv. p. 747. Froif-

CHAP. to the exiled David Bruce, and supported, at least encouraged the Scots in their struggles for independance. Thus refentment gradually filled the breasts of both 1337monarchs, and made them incapable of hearkening to any terms of accommodation, proposed by the pope, who never ceased interposing his good offices between them. Philip thought, that he should be wanting to the first principles of policy, if he abandoned Scotland: Edward affirmed, that he must relinquish all pretensions to generofity, if he withdrew his protection from Robert. The former, informed of fome preparations for hostilities, which had been made by his rival, iffued a fentence of felony and attainder against Robert, and declared, that every vastal of the crown, whether within or without the kingdom, who gave countenance to that traitor, would be involved in the same sentence; a menace easy to be understood: The latter, resolute not to yield, endeavoured to form alliances in the Low Countries and on the frontiers of Germany, the only places from which he either could make an effectual attack upon France, or produce fuch a diversion as might fave the province of Guienne, which lay so much exposed to the power of Philip.

Preparations for war with France. The king began with opening his intentions to the count of Hainault, his father-in-law; and having engaged him in his interests, he employed the good offices and councils of that prince in drawing into his alliance the other sovereigns of that neighbourhood. The duke of Brabant was induced, by his mediation, and by large remittances of money from England, to promise his concurrence s: The archbishop of Cologn, the duke of Gueldres, the marquis of Juliers, the count of Namur, the lords of Fauquemont and Baquen, were engaged by like motives to embrace the English alliance h. These sovered

& Rymer, vol. iv. p. 777.

h Froisfard, liv. 4. chap. 29. 33. 36.

reign |

from t

that q

traord

As

parts (

the lo

of op

that

pend

age,

had I

It wa

over

of a

the

in rei

pe

de

from the bordering countries, great numbers of warlike troops; and naught was wanting to make the force on that quarter very formidable but the accession of Flanders; which Edward procured by means somewhat extraordinary and unusual.

As the Flemings were the first people in the northern parts of Europe, that cultivated arts and manufactures, the lower ranks of men among them had rifen to a degree of opulence unknown elfewhere to those of their station in that barbarous age; had acquired privileges and independance; and began to emerge from that state of vasfalage, or rather of flavery, into which the common people had been univerfally thrown by the feudal institutions. It was probably difficult for them to bring their fovereign and their nobility to conform themselves to the principles of law and civil government, fo much neglected in every other country: It was impossible for them to confine themselves within the proper bounds in their opposition and resentment against any instance of tyranny: They had rifen in tumults: Had infulted the nobles: Had chaced their earl into France: And delivering themselves over to the guidance of a feditious leader, had been guilty of all that insolence and disorder, to which the thoughtless and enraged populace are so much inclined, wherever they are unfortunate enough to be their own masters i.

THEIR present leader was James d'Arteville, a brewer in Ghent, who governed them with a more absolute sway than had ever been assumed by any of their lawful sovereigns: He placed and displaced the magistrates at pleasure: He was accompanied by a guard, who, on the least signal from him, instantly assaffinated any man that happened to fall under his displeasure: All the cities of Flanders were full of his spies; and it was immediate death to remained in the country, lived in continual terror from his violence: He feized the estates of all those whom he had either banished or murdered; and bestowing a part on their wives and children, converted the remainder to his own use k. Such were the first effects, that Europe saw, of popular violence; after having groaned, during so many ages, under monarchical and aristocratical tyranny.

JAMES D'ARTEVILLE was the man, to whom Edward addressed himself for bringing over the Flemings to his interests; and that prince, the most haughty and most aspiring of the age, never courted any ally with so much affiduity and fo many fubmissions, as he employed towards this feditious and criminal tradefman. D'Arteville, proud of these advances from the king of England, and sensible that the Flemings were naturally inclined to maintain connexions with the English, who furnished them the materials of their woollen manufactures, the chief fource of their opulence, readily embraced the interests of Edward, and invited him over into the Low Countries. Edward, before he entered on this great enterprize, affected to confult his parliament, asked their advice, and obtained their confent!. And the more to strengthen his hands, he procured from them a grant of 20,000 facks of wool; which might amount to about a hundred thoufand pounds: This commodity was a good instrument to employ with the Flemings; and the price of it with his German allies. He completed the other necessary fums by loans, by pawning the crown jewels, by confifcating or rather robbing at once all the Lombards, who now exercifed the invidious trade, formerly monopolized by the Jews, of lending on interest m; and being attended

wa bo

In he

reked h

of form

give th

Lewis

h him

amed

he p

the in

of d'A

their a deftro

endle

taker

been .

the f

them

and

alle

k Froissard, liv. 1. chap. 30.

m Dugd, Baron, vol. ii. p. 146.

¹ Cotton's Abridg.

by a body of English forces, and by several of his nobi- C H A P. lity, he sailed over to Flanders.

1338.

THE German princes, in order to justify their unprovoked hostilities against France, had required the fanction of fome legal authority; and Edward, that he might give them fatisfaction on this head, had applied to Lewis of Bavaria, then emperor, and had been created by him vicar of the empire; an empty title, but which feemed to give him a right of commanding the fervice of the princes of Germany ". The Flemings, who were vaffals of France, pretending like fcruples with regard to the invasion of their liege lord; Edward, by the advice of d'Arteville, assumed, in his commissions, the title of king of France, and, in virtue of this right, claimed their affistance for dethroning Philip de Valois, the usurper of his kingdom o. This step, which, he feared, would destroy all future amity between the kingdoms, and beget endless and implacable jealousies in France, was not taken by him without much reluctance and hefitation: And not being in itself very justifiable, it has in the issue been attended with many miseries to both kingdoms. From this period we may date the commencement of that great animofity, which the English nation have ever fince born to the French, which has so visible an influence on all future transactions, and which has been, and continues to be the fpring of many rash and precipitate resolutions among them. In all the preceding reigns fince the conquest, the hostilities between the two crowns had been only casual and temporary; and as they had never been attended with any bloody or dangerous event, the traces of them were eafily obliterated by the first treaty of pacification. The English nobility and gentry valued themselves on their n Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 35. • Heming. p. 303. Walfington, p. 143.

x338.

C H A P. French or Norman extraction: They affected to employ the language of that country in all public transactions, and even in familiar conversation: And both the English court and camp being always full of nobles, who came from different provinces of France, the two people were, during some centuries, more intermingled together than any two distinct nations, whom we meet with in history. But the fatal pretensions of Edward III, dissolved all these connexions, and left the feeds of great animofity in both countries, especially among the English. For it is remarkable, that this latter nation, though they were commonly the aggressors, and by their success and fituation were enabled to commit the most cruel injuries on the other, have always retained a stronger tincture of national antipathy; nor is their hatred retaliated on them to an equal degree by the French. That country lies in the middle of Europe, has been successively engaged in hostilities with all its neighbours, the popular prejudices have been diverted into many channels, and, among a people of fofter manners, they never rose to a great height against any particular nation.

PHILIP made great preparations against the attack from the English, and such as seemed more than sufficient to fecure him from the danger. Besides the concurrence of all the nobility in his own populous and warlike kingdom, his foreign alliances were both more cordial and more powerful than those which were formed by his antagonist. The pope, who, at this time, lived in Avignon, was dependant on France, and being difgusted at the connexions between Edward and Lewis of Bavaria, whom he had excommunicated, he embraced with zeal and fincerity the cause of the French monarch. The king of Navarre, the duke of Britanny, the count of Bar, were in the same interests; and on the side of Germany, the king of Bohemia, the Palatine, the dukes of Lorraine and Austria,

fria, th

lemon themse

per, W their I

even it

mce;

Brabat

in E

ring rafte

could

that t

city

Phillip

enter

even

old

agair

the

ana

the

ftria, the bishop of Liege, the counts of Deuxpont, Vau- C H A P. demont, and Geneva. The allies of Edward were in themselves weaker; and having no object, but his money, which began to be exhausted, they were slow in their motions and irrefolute in their measures. The duke of Brabant, the most powerful among them, seemed even inclined to withdraw himfelf wholly from the alliance; and the king was necessitated, both to give the Brabanters new privileges in trade, and to contract his fon Edward with the daughter of that prince, ere he could bring him to fulfil his engagements. The fummer was wasted in conferences and negociations before Edward could take the field; and he was obliged, in order to allure his German allies into his measures, to pretend that the first attack should be made upon Cambray, a city of the empire which had been garrifoned by Philip P. But finding, upon trial, the difficulty of the enterprize, he conducted them towards the frontiers of France; and he there faw, by a fenfible proof, the vanity of his expectations: The count of Namur, and even the count of Hainault, his brother-in-law, (for the old count was dead) refused to commence hostilities against their liege lord, and retired with their troops q. So little account did they make of Edward's pretentions to the crown of France!

THE king, however, entered the enemy's country, and War with encamped on the fields of Vironfosse near Capelle, with France. an army of near 50,000 men, composed almost entirely of foreigners: Philip approached him with an army of near double the force, composed chiefly of native subjects ; and it was daily expected that a battle would ensue. But the English monarch was averse to engage against so great a fuperiority: The French thought it fufficient if he

P Freisfard, liv. 1, chap. 39. Heming. p. 305. liv. r. chap. 30.

· eluded

C H A P. eluded the attacks of his enemy, without running any unnecessary hazard. The two armies faced each other for fome days: Mutual defiances were fent: And Edward, at last, retired into Flanders, and disbanded his army.

Such was the fruitless and almost ridiculous conclusion of Edward's mighty preparations; and as his measures were the most prudent, that could be embraced in his situation, he might learn from experience in what a hopeless enterprize he was engaged. His expences, though they had led to no end, had been consuming and destructive: He had contracted near 300,000 pounds of debt's; he had anticipated all his revenue; he had pawned every thing of value, which belonged either to himself or his queen; he was obliged in some measure even to pawn himself to his creditors, by not failing to England, till he obtained their permission, and by promising on his word of honour to return in person, if he did not remit their money.

But he was a prince of too much spirit to be discouraged by the sirst difficulties of an undertaking; and he was anxious to retrieve his honour by more successful and more gallant enterprizes. For this purpose, he had, during the course of the campaign, sent orders to summon a parliament by his son Edward, whom he had left with the title of guardian, and to demand some supply in his urgent necessities. The barons seemed inclined to grant his request; but the knights, who often, at this time, acted as a separate body from the burgesses, made some scruple of taxing their constituents, without their consent; and they desired the guardian to summon a new parliament, which might be properly impowered for that purpose. The situation of the king and parliament was,

intere

writ

On t able

ing h

the g

they

they

temp

the i

a re

mon

ed f

Yea!

the

dut

lea

r Froisfard, liv. i. chap. 41, 42, 43. Heming. p. 307. Walling. p. 143.

s Cotton's bridg. p. 17.

for the time, nearly fimilar to that which they constantly C H A P. fell into about the beginning of the last century; and fimilar confequences began visibly to appear. The king. fensible of the frequent demands which he should be obliged to make on his people, had been anxious to ensure to his friends a feat in the house of commons, and at his infligation, the sheriffs and other placemen had made interest to be elected into that assembly; an abuse which the knights defired the king to correct by the tenor of his writ of fummons, and which was accordingly remedied. On the other hand, the knights had professedly annexed conditions to their intended grant, and required a confiderable retrenchment of the royal prerogatives, particularly with regard to purveyance, and the levying of the ancient feudal aids for knighting the king's eldeft fon, and marrying his eldest daughter. The new parliament, called by the guardian, retained the fame free spirit; and though they offered a large fupply of 30,000 facks of wool, no bufiness was concluded; because the conditions, which they annexed, appeared too high to be compensated by a temporary concession. But when Edward himself came over to England, he fummoned another parliament, and he had the interest to procure a supply on more moderate terms. A confirmation of the two charters and of the privileges of boroughs, a pardon for old debts and trespasses, and a remedy for fome abuses in the execution of common law, were the chief conditions infifted on; and the king, in return for his concessions on these heads, obtained from the barons and knights an unufual grant for two years of the ninth sheaf, lamb, and fleece on their estates, and from the burgeffes, a ninth of their moveables at their true value. The whole parliament also granted a duty of forty shillings on each fack of wool exported, on each three hundred wool-fells, and on each last of leather for the fame term of years; but dreading the arbitrary Dd VOL. II.

this grant was to continue no longer, and was not to be drawn into precedent. Being foon after fensible, that this fupply, though considerable and very unusual in that age, would come in slowly, and would not answer the king's urgent necessities, proceeding both from his debts, and his preparations for war; they agreed, that 20,000 facks of wool should immediately be granted him, and their value be deducted from the ninths, which were afterwards to be levied.

Bur there appeared, at this time, another jealoufy in the parliament, which was very reasonable, and was founded on a fentiment that ought to have engaged them rather to cheek than support the king in all those ambitious projects, fo little likely to prove fuccessful, and so dangerous to the nation, if they did. Edward, who, before the commencement of the former campaign, had, in feveral commissions, assumed the title of king of France, now more openly, in all public deeds, gave himself that appellation, and always quartered the arms of France with those of England in his feals and ensigns. The parliament thought proper to obviate the confequences of this measure, and to declare, that they owed him no obedience as king of France, and that the two kingdoms must for ever remain distinct and independant to They undoubtedly forefaw, that France, if subdued, would in the end prove the feat of government; and they deemed this previous protestation necessary, in order to prevent their becoming a province to that monarchy. fecurity, if the event had really taken place !

As Philip was apprized, from the preparations which were making both in England and the Low Countries, that he must expect another invasion from Edward, he

t 14 Edward III.

Atted 0

men;

interce

was m

fil:

Edwar

pained

tacks

The t

he I

дарр

and fi

ant n

degree

ilace

the b

had a two !

darei

gave had

auth

Wit

fitted out a great fleet of 400 vessels, manned with 40,000 C H A P. men; and he stationed them off Sluise, with a view of intercepting the king in his passage. The English navy Naval vicwas much inferior in number, confifting only of 240 tory. fail; but whether it were by the fuperior abilities of 13th Junes Edward, or the greater dexterity of his feamen, they gained the wind of the enemy, and had the fun in their backs: and with these advantages began the action. The battle was fierce and bloody: The English archers, whose force and address were now much celebrated, galled the French on their approach: And when the ships grappled together, and the contest became more steady and furious, the example of the king, and of fo many gallant nobles, who accompanied him, animated to fuch a degree the feamen and foldiery, that they maintained every where a superiority over the enemy. The French also had been guilty of some imprudence in taking their flation so near the coast of Flanders, and chusing that place for the scene of action. The Flemings, descrying the battle, hurried out of their harbours, and brought a reinforcement to the English; which, coming unexpectedly, had a greater effect than in proportion to its power and numbers. Two hundred and thirty French ships were taken: Thirty thousand Frenchmen were killed, with two of their admirals: The loss of the English was inconsiderable, compared to the greatness and importance of the victory ". None of Philip's courtiers, it is faid, dared to inform him of the event; till his fool or jefter gave him a hint, by which he discovered the loss that he had fuftained w.

THE lustre of this great success encreased the king's authority among his allies, who assembled their forces with expedition, and joined the English army. Edward

[&]quot; Froisfard, liv. i. chap. 51. Avesbury, p. 56. Heming: p. 321.

w Walfing. p. 148.

C H A P. marched to the frontiers of France at the head of above 100,000 men, confisting chiefly of foreigners, a more numerous army than, either before or fince, has ever been commanded by any king of England *. At the fame time, the Flemings, to the number of 50,000 men, marched out under the command of Robert of Artois, and laid fiege to St. Omer; but this tumultuary army, composed entirely of tradesmen, unexperienced in war, was routed by a fally of the garrison, and notwithstanding the abilities of their leader, was thrown into fuch a panic, that they were instantly dispersed, and never more appeared in the field. The enterprizes of Edward, though not attended with fo inglorious an iffue, proved equally vain and fruitless. The king of France had affembled an army more numerous than the English; was accompanied by all the chief nobility of his kingdom; was attended by many foreign princes, and even by three monarchs, the kings of Bohemia, Scotland, and Navarre y: Yet he still adhered to the prudent resolution of putting nothing to hazard, and after throwing strong garrifons into all the frontier towns, he retired backwards, perfuaded, that the enemy, having wasted their force in fome tedious and unsuccessful enterprize, would afford him an easy victory.

Tournay was at that time one of the most considerable cities of Flanders, containing above 60,000 inhabitants of all ages, who were affectionate to the French government; and as the fecret of Edward's defign had not been flrictly kept, Philip learned, that the English, in order to gratify their Flemish allies, had intended to open the campaign with the fiege of this place: He took care therefore to supply it with a garrison of 14,000 men, commanded by the bravest nobility of France; and he reasonably expected, that these forces, joined to the x Rymer, vol. v. p. 197.

hery

Me !

ide.

and a

Elve

the

who

Was

at 240

an

y Froisfard, liv. i. chap. 57.

inhabitants, would be able to defend the city against all C H A P. the efforts of the enemy. Accordingly, Edward, when he commenced the fiege about the end of July, found every where an obstinate resistance: The valour of one fide was encountered with equal valour by the other: Every affault was repulfed and proved unfuccefsful: And the king was at last obliged to turn the fiege into a blockade, in hopes that the great numbers of the garrison and citizens, which had enabled them to defend themfelves against his attacks, would but expose them to be the more easily reduced by famine z. The count of Eu, who commanded in Tournay, as foon as he perceived that the English had formed this plan of operations, endeavoured to fave his provisions, by expelling all the useless mouths; and the duke of Brabant, who wished no fuccess to Edward's enterprizes, gave every one a free passage through his quarters.

AFTER the fiege had continued ten weeks, the city was reduced to distress; and Philip, recalling all his scattered garrisons, advanced towards the English camp at the head of a mighty army, with an intention of still avoiding any decifive action, but of feeking fome opportunity for throwing relief into the place. Here Edward, irritated with the small progress he had hitherto made, and with the disagreeable prospect that lay before him, fent Philip a defiance by a herald; and challenged him to decide their claims for the crown of France, either by fingle combat, or by an action of a hundred against a hundred, or by a general engagement. But Philip replied, that Edward having done homage to him for the dutchy of Guienne, and having folemnly acknowledged him for his fuperior, it by no means became him to fend a defiance to his liege lord and fovereign: That he was confident, notwithstanding all Edward's preparations, and CHAP. his conjunction with the rebellious Flemings, he himself I should foon be able to chace him from the frontiers of France: That as the hostilities from England had prevented him from executing his purposed crusade against the infidels, he trufted in the affiftance of the Almighty, who would reward his pious intentions, and punish the aggressor, whose ill-grounded claims had rendered them abortive: That Edward proposed a duel on very unequal terms, and offered to hazard only his own person, against both the kingdom of France, and the person of the king: But that, if he would encrease the stake, and put also the kingdom of England on the issue of the duel, he would, notwithstanding that the terms would still be unequal, very willingly accept of the challenge 2. It was easy to see, that these mutual bravadoes were intended only to dazzle the populace, and that the two kings were too wife to think of executing their pretended purpose.

WHILE the French and English armies lay in this fituation, and a general action was every day expected, Jane, countess dowager of Hainault, interposed with her good offices, and endeavoured to conciliate peace between the contending monarchs, and to prevent any farther effusion of blood. This princess was mother-in-law to Edward, and fifter to Philip; and though she had taken the vows in a convent, and had renounced the world, the left her retreat on this occasion, and employed all her pious efforts to allay those animosities, which had taken place between perfons fo nearly related to her, and to each other. As Philip had no material claims on his antagonist, she found that he hearkened willingly to the propofals; and even the haughty and ambitious Edward, convinced of his fruitless attempt, was not averse to her

MAC MAC

211 hot

the

W

² Du Tillet, Recueil de Traitez, &c. Heming. p. 325, 326. Walfing. P. 149.

suegociation. He was fensible from experience, that he C H A P. had engaged in an enterprize which far exceeded his force; and that the power of England was never likely to pre-1340. vail over that of a superior kingdom, firmly united under an able and prudent monarch. He discovered, that all the allies, whom he could gain by negociation, were at bottom averse to his enterprize; and though they might fecond it to a certain length, would immediately detach themselves, and oppose its final accomplishment, if ever they could be brought to think, that there was feriously any danger of it. He even faw, that their chief purpose was to obtain money from him; and as his supplies from England came in very flowly, and had much disappointed his expectations, he perceived their growing indifference in his cause, and their desire of embracing all plausible terms of accommodation. Convinced at last, that an undertaking must be imprudent, which could only be supported by means fo unequal to the end, he concluded a truce, which left both parties in possession of their pre-3d Sept. fent acquisitions, and stopped all farther hostilities on the fide of the Low Countries, Guienne, and Scotland, till Midfummer next b. A negociation was foon after opened at Arras, under the mediation of the pope's legates; and the truce was attempted to be converted into a folid peace. Edward here required, that Philip should free Guienne from all claims of fuperiority, and entirely withdraw his protection from Scotland; But as he feemed not any wife entitled to make fuch high demands, either from his past successes, or future prospects, they were totally rejected by Philip, who agreed only to a prolongation of the truce.

THE king of France foon after detached the emperor Lewis from the alliance of England, and engaged him to revoke the title of imperial vicar, which he had conferred

b Froiffard, liv. i. chap. 64. Avesbury, p. 65.

Dd4

on

of France, disappointed in their hopes, gradually with1340. drew from the confederacy. And Edward himself, haraffed by his numerous and importunate creditors, was obliged to make his escape by stealth into England.

Domestic disturbances.

THE unufual tax of a ninth sheaf, lamb, and sleece, imposed by parliament, together with the great want of money, and still more, of credit in England, had rendered the remittances to Flanders extremely backward; nor could it be expected, that any expeditious method of collecting an imposition, which was so new ia itself, and which yielded only a gradual produce, could possibly be contrived by the king or his ministers. And though the parliament, foreseeing the inconvenience, had granted, as a present resource, 20,000 facks of wool, the only English goods that bore a fure price in foreign markets, and were the next to ready money; it was impossible, but the getting possession of fuch a bulky commodity, the gathering of it from different parts of the kingdom, and the difposing of it abroad, must take up more time than the urgency of the king's affairs would permit, and must occafion all the difappointments complained of, during the course of the campaign. But though nothing had happened, which Edward might not reasonably have forefeen, he was so irritated with the unfortunate issue of his military operations, and fo much vexed and affronted by his foreign creditors, that he was determined to throw the blame formewhere off himself, and he came in very bad humour into England. He discovered his peevish disposition by the first act which he performed after his arrival: As he landed unexpectedly, he found the Tower negligently guarded; and he immediately committed to prison, the constable and all others who had the charge of that fortress, and he treated them with unusual rigour d.

d Ypod. Neuft. p. 513.

her

211

ed:

of new

the 7

the

afti

an

pen

D

W

c Heming. p. 352. Ypod. Neuft. p. 514. Knyghten, p. 2580.

His vengeance fell next on the officers of the revenue, the C H A P. theriffs, the collectors of the taxes, the undertakers of all kinds; and besides dismissing all of them from their employments, he appointed commissioners to enquire into their conduct; and these men, in order to gratify the king's humour, were fure not to find any person innocent, who came before them c. Sir John St. Paul, keeper of the privy teal, Sir John Stonore, chief justice, Andrew Aubrey, mayor of London, were displaced and imprisoned: as were also the bishop of Chichester, chancellor, and the bishop of Lichfield, treasurer. Stratford, archbishop of Canterbury, to whom the charge of collecting the new taxes hid been chiefly entrusted, fell likewise under the king's displeasure; but being absent at the time of Edward's arrival, he escaped feeling the immediate effects of it.

THERE were strong reasons, which might discourage the kings of England, in those ages, from bestowing the chief offices of the crown on prelates and other ecclefiaffical perfors. These men had so entrenched themselves in privileges and immunities, and fo openly challenged an exemption from all fecular jurisdiction, that no civil penalty could be inflicted on them for any malversation in office; and as even treason itself was declared to be no canonical offence, nor was allowed to be a sufficient reafon for deprivation or other spiritual censures, that order of men had enfured to themselves an almost total impunity, and were not bound by any political law or flatute. But, on the other hand, there were many peculiar causes which favoured their promotion. Befides that they possessed almost all the learning of the age, and were best qualified for civil employments; the prelates enjoyed equal dignity with the greatest barons, and gave weight, by their perfonal authority, to the powers entrusted with them:

c Avesbury, p. 70. Heming. p. 326. Walfingham, p. 150.

410

by accumulating wealth or influence in their families, and were restrained, by the decency of their character, from that open rapine and violence, so often practised by the nobles. These motives had induced Edward, as well as many of his predecessors, to entrust the chief departments of government in the hands of ecclesiastics; at the hazard of seeing them disown his authority as soon as it was turned against them.

This was the cafe with archbishop Stratford. That 2341. prelate, informed of Edward's indignation against him, prepared himself for the storm; and not content with standing upon the defensive, he resolved, by beginning the attack, to show the king, that he knew the privileges of his character, and had courage to maintain them. He iffued a general fentence of excommunication against all, who, on any pretext, exercised violence on the person or goods of clergymen; who infringed those privileges fecured by the great charter, and by ecclefiaftical canons; or who accused a prelate of treason or any other crime, in order to bring him under the king's displeasure f. Even Edward had reason to think himself struck at by this fentence; both on account of the imprisonment of the two bishops and that of other clergymen concerned in levying the taxes, and on account of his feizing their lands and moveables, that he might make them answerable for any balance, which remained in their hands. The clergy, with the primate at their head, were now formed into a regular combination against the king; and many calumnies were spread against him, in order to deprive him of the confidence and affections of his people. It was pretended, that he meant to recal the general pardon, and the remission which he had granted of old debts, and

pol

rit

an

Wi

an

Wa

Heming. p. 339. Ang. Sacra, vol. i. p. 21, 22. Walfingham, p. 153.

and to impose new and arbitrary taxes without consent of C H A P. parliament. The archbishop went so far, in a letter to the king himself, as to tell him, that there were two powers, by which the world was governed, the holy pontifical apostolic dignity, and the royal subordinate authority: That of these two powers, the clerical was evidently the supreme; fince the priests were to answer, at the tribunal of the divine judgment, for the conduct of kings themselves: That the clergy were the spiritual fathers of all the faithful, and amongst others of kings and princes; and were intitled, by a heavenly charter, to direct their wills and actions, and to cenfure their transgressions: And that prelates had heretofore cited emperors before their tribunal, had fitten in judgment on their life and behaviour. and had anathematized them for their obstinate offences s. These topics were not well calculated to appease Edward's indignation; and when he called a parliament, he fent not to the primate, as to the other peers, a fummons to attend it. Stratford was not discouraged at this mark of neglect or anger: He appeared before the gates, arrayed in his pontifical robes, holding the crofier in his hand, and accompanied by a pompous train of priests and prelates; and he required admittance as the first and higheft peer in the realm. During two days, the king rejected his application: But fenfible, either that this affair might be attended with dangerous confequences, or that in his impatience he had groundlessly accused the primate of malversation in his office, which seems really to have been the case; he at last permitted him to take his seat, and was reconciled to him h.

EDWARD now found himself in a bad situation both with his own people and with foreign flates; and it required all his genius and capacity to extricate himfelf h Anglia Sacra, vol. i. p. 38, g Anglia Sacra, vol. i. p. 27. 39, 40, 41.

from

tol

mai

arre

Wil

abo

101 tha

an

1341.

C H A P. from such multiplied difficulties and embarrassments. His unjust and exorbitant claims on France and Scotland had engaged him in an implacable war with these two kingdoms, his nearest neighbours: He had lost almost all his foreign alliances by his irregular payments: He was deeply involved in debts, for which he owed a confuming interest: His military operations had vanished into smoke; and except his naval victory, none of them had been attended even with glory or renown, either to himself or to the nation: The animofity between him and the clergy was open and declared: The people were discontented on account of many arbitrary measures, in which he had been engaged: And what was more dangerous, the nobility, taking advantage of his prefent necessities, were determined to retrench his power, and by encroaching on the ancient prerogatives of the crown, to acquire to themselves independance and authority. But the aspiring genius of Edward, which had fo far transported him beyond the bounds of discretion, proved at last sufficient to re-instate him in his former authority, and finally to render his reign the most triumphant that is to be met with in English story: Though for the present he was obliged, with fome loss of honour, to yield to the current, which bore so strongly against him.

THE parliament framed an act, which was likely to produce confiderable innovations in the government. They premifed, that, whereas the great charter had, to the manifest peril and slander of the king and damage of his people, been violated in many points, particularly by the imprisonment of free men and the seizure of their goods, without fuit, indictment, or trial, it was necesfary to confirm it anew, and to oblige all the chief officers of the law, together with the steward and chamberlain of the houshold, the keeper of the privy-feal, the controller and treasurer of the wardrobe, and those who were were entrusted with the education of the young prince, C H A P. to fwear to the regular observance of it. They also remarked, that the peers of the realm had formerly been arrested and imprisoned, and dispossessed of their temporalities and lands, and even fome of them put to death, without judgment or trial; and they therefore enacted that fuch violences should henceforth cease, and no peer be punished but by the award of his peers in parliament. They required, that, whenever any of the great offices above mentioned became vacant, the king should fill it by the advice of his council, and the confent of fuch barons as should at that time be found to reside in the neighbourhood of the court. And they enacted, that, on the third day of every fession, the king should resume into his own hand all these offices, except those of justices of the two benches and the barons of exchequer; that the ministers should for the time be reduced to private persons; that they should in that condition answer before parliament to any accufation brought against them; and that, if they were found any wife guilty, they should finally be dispossessed of their offices, and more able persons be substituted in their place i. By these last regulations, the barons approached as near as they durst to those refrictions, which had formerly been imposed on Henry III. and Edward II. and which, from the dangerous confequences attending them, had become fo generally odious, that they did not expect to have either the concurrence of the people in demanding them, or the affent of the prefent king in granting them.

In return for these important concessions, the parliament offered the king a grant of 20,000 facks of wool; and his wants were fo urgent, from the clamours of his creditors, and the demands of his foreign allies, that he

i 15 Edw. III.

C H A P. was obliged to accept of the supply on these hard conditions. He ratified this flatute in full parliament; but he fecretly entered a protest of such a nature, as were suffi-1341. cient, one should imagine, to destroy all future trust and confidence with his people: He declared, that, as foon as his convenience permitted, he would, from his own authority, revoke what had been extorted from him k. Accordingly, he was no fooner possessed of the parliamentary fupply, than he issued an edict, which contains many extraordinary positions and pretensions. He first afferts, that that statute had been enacted contrary to law; as if a free legislative body could ever do any thing illegal. He next affirms, that, as it was hurtful to the prerogatives of the crown which he had fworn to defend, he had only diffembled, when he feemed to ratify it, but that he had never in his own breast given his assent to it. He does not pretend, that either he or the parliament lay under force; but only that some inconvenience would have enfued, had he not feemingly affixed his fanction to that pretended statute. He therefore, with the advice of his council and of some earls and barons, abrogates and annuls it; and though he professes himself willing and determined to observe such articles of it as were formerly law, he declares it to have thenceforth no force or authority 1. The parliaments, that were afterwards affembled, took no notice of this arbitrary exertion of royal power, which, by a parity of reason, left all their laws at the mercy of the king; and during the course of two years, Edward had so far re-established his influence, and freed himself from his present necessities, that he then obtained from his parliament a legal repeal of the obKek

rema and

emp

of la

B

the

ing

fou

one

he

k Statutes at Large, 15 Edw. III. That this protest of the king's was fecret appears evidently, since otherwise it would have been ridiculous in the parliament to have accepted of his affent: Besides the king owns that he diffembled, which would not have been the case, had his protest been public.

¹ Statutes at Large, 15 Edw. III.

noxious statute ". This transaction certainly contains C H A P. remarkable circumstances, which discover the manners and fentiments of the age, and may prove what inaccu-1341. rate work might be expected from fuch rude hands, when employed in legislation, and in rearing the delicate fabric of laws and a constitution.

Bur though Edward had happily recovered his authority at home, which had been impaired by the events of the French war, he had undergone fo many mortifications from that attempt, and faw fo little prospect of succefs, that he would probably have dropped his claim, had not a revolution in Britanny opened to him more promifing views, and given his enterprizing genius a full opportunity of displaying itself.

JOHN III. duke of Britanny, had, during fome years, Affairs of found himself declining through age and infirmities; Britanny. and having no iffue, he was folicitous to prevent those disorders, to which, on the event of his demise, a disputed succession might expose his subjects. His younger brother, the count of Penthievre, had left only one daughter, whom the duke deemed his heir; and as his family had inherited the dutchy by a female succession, he thought her title preferable to that of the count of Mountfort, who, being his brother by a fecond marriage, was the male heir of that principality n. He accordingly purposed to bestow his niece in marriage on some person, who might be able to defend her rights; and he cast his eye on Charles of Blois, nephew of the king of France, by his mother, Margaret of Valois, fifter to that monarch. But as he both loved his subjects and was beloved by them, he determined not to take this important stepwithout their approbation; and having affembled the states of Britanny, he represented to them the advantages

m Cotton's Abridgm, p. 38, 39. n Froiffard, liv. r. chap. 64.

c H A P. of that alliance, and the prospect, which it gave, of an entire settlement of the succession. The Bretons willingly concurred in his choice: The marriage was concluded: All his vassals, and among the rest, the count of Mountfort, swore fealty to Charles and to his confort as to their future sovereigns: And every danger of civil commotions seemed to be obviated, as far as human prudence could provide a remedy against them.

Bur on the death of this good prince, the ambition of the count of Mountfort broke through all these regulations, and kindled a war, not only dangerous to Britanny, but to a great part of Europe. While Charles of Blois was foliciting at the court of France the investiture of the dutchy, Mountfort was active in acquiring immediate possession of it; and by force or intrigue he made himfelf mafter of Rennes, Nantz, Breft, Hennebonne, and all the most important fortresses, and engaged many confiderable barons to acknowledge his authority o. Senfible that he could expect no favour from Philip, he made a voyage to England, on pretence of foliciting his claim to the earldom of Richmond, which had devolved to him by his brother's death; and there, offering to do homage to Edward, as king of France, for the dutchy of Britanny, he proposed a strict alliance for the support of their mutual pretensions. Edward faw immediately the advantages attending this treaty: Mountfort, an active and valiant prince, closely united to him by interest, opened at once an entrance into the heart of France, and afforded him much more flattering views, than his allies on the fide of Germany and the Low Countries, who had no fincere attachment to his cause, and whose progress was also obstructed by those numerous fortifications, which had been raifed on that frontier. Robert of Artois was

o Froiffard, liv. 1. chap. 65, 66, 67, 68.

100

(p) (b) (b)

alli

reg

dire

mee

1 teti

flor

up

fpirit of Edward was little disposed to fit down under those repulses which he had received, and which, he Renewal of thought, had so much impaired his reputation: And it the war with required a very short negociation to conclude a treaty of France. alliance between two men; who, though their pleas with regard to the preference of male or female succession were directly opposite, were intimately connected by their immediate interests?

As this treaty was fill a fecret, Mountfort, on his return, ventured to appear at Paris, in order to defend his cause before the court of peers; but observing Philip and his judges to be prepossessed against his title, and dreading their intentions of arresting him, till he should restore what he had seized by violence, he suddenly made his escape; and war immediately commenced between him and Charles of Blois 9. Philip sent his eldest son, the duke of Normandy, with a powerful army, to the assistance of the latter; and Mountfort, unable to keep the field against his rival, remained in the city of Nantz, where he was besieged. The city was taken by the treachery of the inhabitants; Mountfort fell into the hands of his enemies; was conducted as a prisoner to Paris; and was shut up in the tower of the Louvre.

This event feemed to put an end to the pretentions of the count of Mountfort; but his affairs were immediately retrieved by an unexpected incident, which infpired new life and vigour into his party. Jane of Flanders, countess of Mountfort, the most extraordinary woman of the age, was rouzed, by the captivity of her husband, from those domestic cares, to which she had hitherto limited

13424

P Froiffard, liv. 1. chap. 69.

9 Ibid, chap. 70, 71.

r Ibid. chap. 73.

Vol. II.

Eε

her

tomp

tons;

曲

were the e mer

to I

cam

the 1

at]

app

lat

th

W

C H A P. her genius; and she courageously undertook to support the falling fortunes of her family. No fooner did she receive the fatal intelligence, than she affembled the inha-1342. bitants of Rennes, where the then refided; and carrying her infant fon in her arms, deplored to them the calamity of their fovereign. She recommended to their care the illustrious orphan, the fole male remaining of their ancient princes, who had governed them with fuch indulgence and lenity, and to whom they had ever professed the most zealous attachment. She declared herfelf willing to run all hazards with them in fo just a cause; difcovered the resources which still remained in the alliance of England; and entreated them to make one effort against an usurper, who, being imposed on them by the arms of France, would in return make a facrifice to his protector of the ancient liberties of Britanny. The audience, moved by the affecting appearance, and inspirited by the noble conduct, of the princefs, vowed to live and die with her in defending the rights of her family: All the other fortresses of Britanny embraced the same resolution: The countefs went from place to place, encouraging the garrifons, providing them with every thing necessary for subfistance, and concerting the proper plans of defence; and after she had put the whole province in a good posture, she shut herself up in Hennebonne, where she waited with impatience the arrival of those fuccours, which Edward had promised her. Mean while, she sent over her son to England, that she might both put him in a place of safety, and engage the king more strongly, by such a pledge, to embrace with zeal the interests of her family.

CHARLES OF BLOIS, anxious to make himself master of so important a fortress as Hennebone, and still more to take the countess prisoner, from whose vigour and capacity all the difficulties to his succession in Britanny now proceeded, sat down before the place, with a great army, composed composed of French, Spaniards, Genoese, and some Bre- C H A P. tons; and he conducted the attack with indefatigable induftry s. The defence was no less vigorous: The befiegers were repulsed in every affault: Frequent sallies were made with fuccess by the garrison: And the countels herself being the most forward in all military operations, every one was ashamed not to exert himself to the utmost in this desperate situation. One day she perceived, that the besiegers, entirely occupied in an attack, had neglected a diftant quarter of their camp; and she immediately fallied forth at the head of a body of 200 cavalry, threw them into confusion, did great execution upon them, and fet fire to their tents, baggage, and magazines: But when she was preparing to return, she found that she was intercepted, and that a considerable body of the enemy had thrown themselves between her and the gates. She inftantly took her resolution: She ordered her men to disband, and to make the best of their way by flight to Brest: She met them at the appointed place of rendezvous, collected another body of 500 horse, returned to Hennebonne, broke unexpectedly through the enemy's camp, and was received with shouts and acclamations by the garrison, who, encouraged by this reinforcement, and by fo rare an example of female valour, determined to de. fend themselves to the last extremity.

THE reiterated attacks, however, of the besiegers had at length made feveral breaches in the walls; and it was apprehended, that a general affault, which was every hour expected, would overpower the garrison, diminished in numbers, and extremely weakened with watching and fatigue. It became necessary to treat of a capitulation; and the bishop of Leon was already engaged, for that purpose, in a conference with Charles of Blois; when the countess, who had mounted to a high tower,

* Froiffard, liv. i. chap. 81.

CHAP, and was looking towards the fea with great impatience, descried some fails at a distance. She immediately exclaimed: Beheld the succours! the English succours! No capitulation t. This fleet had on board a body of heavyarmed cavalry, and fix thousand archers, whom Edward had prepared for the relief of Hennebonne, but who had been long detained by contrary winds. They entered the harbour under the command of Sir Walter Manny, one of the bravest captains of England; and having inspired fresh courage into the garrison, immediately fallied forth, beat the besiegers from all their posts, and obliged them to decamp.

> Bur notwithstanding this success, the countess of Mountfort found that her party, overpowered by numbers, was declining in every quarter; and she went over to folicit more effectual fuccours from the king of England. Edward granted her a confiderable reinforcement under Robert of Artois; who embarked on board a fleet of forty-five ships, and failed to Britanny. He was met in his passage by the enemy; an action ensued, where the countefs behaved with her wonted valour, and charged the enemy fword in hand; but the hostile fleets, after a sharp action, were separated by a storm, and the English arrived fafely in Britanny. The first exploit of Robert was the taking of Vannes, which he maftered by conduct and address ": But he survived a very little time this prosperity. The Breton noblemen of the party of Charles affembled fecretly in arms, attacked Vannes of a fudden, and carried the place; chiefly by reason of a wound received by Robert, of which he foon after died at fea on his return to England w.

> AFTER the death of this unfortunate prince, the chief author of all the calamities, with which his country was

> > 2 9 1

t Froisfard, liv. i. chap. Sr. " Ibid, chap. 93.

w Ibid, chap. 94.

overwhelmed for more than a century, Edward undertook C H A P. in person the defence of the counters of Mountfort; and as the last truce with France was now expired, the war, which the English and French had hitherto carried on as allies to the competitors for Britanny, was thenceforth conducted in the name and under the standard of the two monarchs. The king landed at Morbian near Vannes, with an army of 12,000 men; and being mafter of the field, he endeavoured to give a luftre to his arms, by commencing at once three important fleges, that of Vannes, of Rennes, and of Nantz. But by undertaking too much, he failed of fuccess in all his enterprizes. Even the fiege of Vannes, which Edward in person conducted with vigour, advanced but flowly x; and the French had all the leifure requifite for making preparations against him. The duke of Normandy, eldest son of Philip, appeared in Britanny at the head of an army of 30,000 infantry, and 4000 cavalry; and Edward was now obliged to draw together all his forces, and to entrench himself frongly before Vannes, where the duke of Normandy foon after arrived, and in a manner invested the besiegers. The garrison and the French camp were plentifully supplied with provisions; while the English, who durst not make any attempt upon the place in the presence of a superior army, drew all their fubfistance from England, exposed to the hazards of the sea, and sometimes to those which arose from the fleet of the enemy. In this dangerous fituation, Edward willingly hearkened to the mediation of the pope's legates, the cardinals of Palestrine and Frescati, who endeavoured to negociate, if not a peace, at least a truce between the two kingdoms. A treaty was concluded for a ceffation of arms during three years ": and Edward had the abilities, notwithstanding his present dangerous fituation, to procure to himself very equal and 1343.

y Ibid. chap. 99. Avesbury, p. 103. * Froiffard, liv. 1. chap. 95. honourable Ee 3

CHAP. honourable terms. It was agreed, that Vannes should be fequestered, during the truce, in the hands of the legates, to be disposed of afterwards as they pleased; and though 1343. Edward knew the partiality of the court of Rome towards his antagonists, he faved himself by this device from the dishonour of having undertaken a fruitless enterprize. It was also stipulated, that all prisoners should be released, that the places in Britanny should remain in the hands of the present possessions, and that the allies on both sides should be comprehended in the truce z. Edward, soon after concluding this treaty, embarked with his army for England.

> THE truce, though calculated for a long time, was of very short duration; and each monarch endeavoured to throw on the other the blame of its infraction. Of course, the historians of the two countries differ in their account of the matter. It feems probable, however, as is affirmed by the French writers, that Edward, in confenting to the truce, had no other view than to extricate himself from a perilous situation, into which he had fallen, and was afterwards very careless in observing it. In all the memorials which remain on this fubject, he complains chiefly of the punishment inflicted on Oliver de Clisson, John de Montauban, and other Breton noblemen, who, he fays, were partizans of the family of Mountfort, and consequently under the protection of England a. But it appears, that, at the conclusion of the truce, those noblemen had openly, by their declarations and actions, embraced the cause of Charles of Blois b; and if they had entered into any fecret correfpondence and engagements with Edward, they were traitors to their party, and were justly punishable by Philip and Charles, for their breach of faith; nor had Edward ties.

107

the

fons

him

wer

loug

tent

1

tar

De.

200

gree

of v

ma

th

rec

V2

do

^{496.} Heming. p. 376.

Heming, p. 359. 2 Rymer, vol. v. p. 453, 454, 459. 466. b Froissard, liv. 1. chap. 96. p. 100.

any ground of complaint against France for such severi- C H A P. ties. But when he laid these pretended injuries before the parliament, whom he affected to confult on all occafions, that affembly entered into the quarrel, advised the king not to be amused by a fraudulent truce, and granted him supplies for the renewal of the war: The counties were charged with a fifteenth for two years, and the boroughs with a tenth. The clergy confented to give a tenth for three years.

THESE supplies enabled the king to complete his military preparations; and he fent his cousin, Henry earl of Derby, fon of the earl of Lancaster, into Guienne, for the defence of that province c. This prince, the most accomplished in the English court, possessed to a high degree the virtues of justice and humanity, as well as those of valour and conduct d, and not content with protecting and cherishing the province committed to his care, he made a successful invasion on the enemy. He attacked the count of Lisse, the French general, at Bergerac, beat him from his entrenchments, and took the place. He reduced a great part of Perigord, and continually advanced in his conquests, till the count of Lisle, having collected an army of ten or twelve thousand men, sat down before Auberoche, in hopes of recovering that place, which had fallen into the hands of the English. The earl of Derby came upon him by furprize with only a thousand cavalry, threw the French into disorder, pushed his advantage, and obtained a complete victory. Lisle himself, with many considerable nobles, was taken pri-

1345+

e Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 103. Avesbury, p. 121,

d It is reported of this prince, that, having once, before the attack of a town, promifed the foldiers the plunder, one privace man happened to fall upon a great cheft full of money, which he immediately brought to the earl, as thinking it too great for himself to keep possession of it. But Derby told him, that his promife did not depend on the greatness or smallness of the fum; and ordered him to keep it all for his own use.

rapid progress in subduing the French provinces. He took Monsegur, Monpesat, Villesranche, Miremont, and Tonnins, with the fortress of Damassen. Aiguillon, a fortress deemed impregnable, fell into his hands from the cowardice of the governor. Angouleme was surrendered after a short siege. The only place, where he met with considerable resistance, was Reole, which, however, was at last reduced after a siege of above nine weeks. He made an attempt on Blaye, but thought it more prudent to raise the siege, than waste his time before a place of small importance.

THE reason, why Derby was permitted to make, with-1346. out opposition, such progress on the side of Guienne, was the difficulties under which the French finances then laboured, and which had obliged Philip to lay on new impolitions, particularly the duty on falt, to the great difcontent, and almost mutiny of his subjects. But after the court of France was supplied with money, great preparations were made; and the duke of Normandy, attended by the duke of Burgundy, and other great nobility, led towards Guienne a powerful army, which the English could not think of refifting in the open field. The earl of Derby flood on the defensive, and allowed the French to carry on at leifure the fiege of Angouleme, which was their first enterprize. John lord Norwich, the governor, after a brave and vigorous defence, found himfelf reduced to fuch extremities, as obliged him to employ a stratagem, in order to fave his garrison, and to prevent his being reduced to furrender at discretion. He appeared on the walls, and defired a parley with the duke of Normandy. The prince there told Norwich, that he supposed he intene

10 0

15 }

se t

hav

ma

can

ed,

wh

con

lov

Ai

gel

to

e Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 104.

f Ibid. chap. 110.

g Ibid. chap. 112.

tended to capitulate. " Not at all," replied the gover- C H A P. nor: " But as to-morrow is the feast of the Virgin, to 66 whom, I know, that you, Sir, as well as myfelf, 66 bear a great devotion, I defire a cellation of arms for " that day." The proposal was agreed to; and Norwich, having ordered his forces to prepare all their baggage, marched out next day, and advanced towards the French camp. The befiegers, imagining they were to be attacked, ran to their arms; but Norwich fent a messenger to the duke, reminding him of his engagement. The duke, who piqued himself on faithfully keeping his word, exclaimed, I fee the governor has outwitted me : But let us be content with gaining the place: And the English were allowed to pass through the camp unmolested b. After fome other successes, the duke of Normandy laid siege to Aiguillon; and as the natural strength of the fortress, together with a brave garrison under the command of the earl of Pembroke, and Sir Walter Manny, rendered it impossible to take the place by assault, he purposed, after making feveral fruitless attacks i, to reduce it by famine: But before he could finish this enterprize, he was called to another quarter of the kingdom, by one of the greatest disasters that ever befel the French monarchy k.

EDWARD, informed by the earl of Derby of the great danger to which Guienne was exposed, had prepared a force with which he intended in person to bring it relief. He embarked at Southampton on board a fleet of near a thousand sail of all dimensions; and carried with him, besides all the chief nobility of England, his eldest son the prince of Wales, now fifteen years of age. winds proved long contrary 1; and the king, in defpair of arriving in time at Guienne, was at last persuaded by Geoffry d'Harcourt, to change the destination of his en-

h Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 120. i Ibid. chap. 121;

k Ibid. chap. 134.

¹ Avesbury, p. 123.

CHAP. terprize. This nobleman was a Norman by birth, had xv. long made a confiderable figure in the court of France, and was generally esteemed for his personal merit and his valour; but being disobliged and persecuted by Philip, he had fled into England; had recommended himself to Edward, who was an excellent judge of men; and had succeeded to Robert of Artois in the invidious office of exciting and affifting the king in every enterprize against his native country. He had long infifted, that an expedition to Normandy promifed, in the present circumstances, more favourable success, than one to Guienne; that Edward would find the northern provinces almost destitute of military force, which had been drawn to the fouth; that they were full of flourishing cities, whose plunder would enrich the English; that their cultivated fields, as yet unspoiled by war, would supply them with plenty of provisions; and that the neighbourhood of the capital rendered every event of importance in those quarters m. These reasons, which had not before been duly weighed by Edward, began to make more impression after the disappointments which he had met with in his voyage to Guienne: He ordered his fleet to fail to Normandy, and fafely difembarked his army at la Hogue.

2th July.

Invafion of France.

THIS army, which, during the course of the ensuing campaign, was crowned with the most splendid success, confisted of four thousand men at arms, ten thousand archers, ten thousand Welsh infantry, and fix thousand Irish. The Welsh and the Irish were light, disorderly troops, fitter for doing execution in a pursuit, or scouring the country, than for any stable action. The bow was always efteemed a frivolous weapon, where true military discipline was known, and regular bodies of well-armed foot maintained. The only folid force in this army were the men at arms; and even these, being cavalry, were,

on

eyer

War

W:

цр

of ·

m

qı

m ot. on that account, much inferior, in the shock of battle, C H A P. to good infantry: And as the whole were new levied troops, we are led to entertain a very mean idea of the military force of those ages, which, being ignorant of every other art, had not properly cultivated the art of war itself, the sole object of general attention.

THE king created the earl of Arundel constable of his army, and the earls of Warwic and Harcourt, mareschals: He bestowed the honour of knighthood on the prince of Wales and feveral of the young nobility, immediately upon his landing. After destroying all the ships in la Hogue, Barfleur, and Cherbourg, he spread his army over the whole country, and gave them an unbounded licence of burning, spoiling, and plundering every place, of which they became masters. The loose discipline, then prevalent, could not be much hurt by these disorderly practices; and Edward took care to prevent any furprize, by giving orders to his troops, however they might disperse themselves in the day-time, always to quarter themselves at night near the main body. In this manner, Montebourg, Carentan, St. Lo, Valognes, and other places in the Cotentin, were pillaged without refiftance: and an universal confernation was spread over the province ".

THE intelligence of this unexpected invalion foon reached Paris; and threw Philip into great perplexity. He issued orders, however, for levying forces in all quarters, and dispatched the count of Eu, constable of France, and the count of Tancarville, with a body of troops, to the defence of Caën, a populous and commercial but open city, which lay in the neighbourhood of the English army. The temptation of so rich a prize soon allured Edward to approach it; and the inhabitants, encouraged by their numbers, and by the reinforcements which

C H A P. they daily received from the country, ventured to meet him in the field. But their courage failed them on the first shock: They sled with precipitation: The counts of Eu and Tancarville were taken prisoners: The victors entered the city along with the vanquished, and a furious massacre commenced, without distinction of age, fex, or condition. The citizens, in defpair, barricadoed their houses, and affaulted the English with stones, bricks, and every miffile weapon: The English made way by fire to the destruction of the citizens: Till Edward, anxious to fave both his spoil and his foldiers, stopped the massacre; and having obliged the inhabitants to lay down their arms, gave his troops licence to begin a more regular and lefshazardous plunder of the city. The pillage continued for three days: The king referved for his own share the iewels, plate, filks, fine cloth, and fine linen; and he bestowed all the remainder of the spoil on his army. The whole was embarked on board the ships, and fent over to England; together with three hundred of the richest citizens of Caen, whose ransom was an additional profit, which he expected afterwards to levy . This difmal scene passed in the presence of two cardinal legates, who had come to negociate a peace between the kingdoms.

THE king moved next to Rouen in hopes of treating that city in the same manner; but found, that the bridge over the Seine was already broken down, and that the king of France himself was arrived there with his army. He marched along the banks of that river towards Paris, destroying the whole country, and every town and village, which he met with on his road P. Some of his light troops carried their ravages even to the gates of Paris; and the royal palace of St. Germans, together with Nanterre, Ruelle, and other villages, was reduced to ashes within fight of the capital. The English intended to pass the river at Poissy, but found the French army encamped on

the (

encl

Arat

orde

but

atte

ma

wit

Son

A

10 G

P

W

[·] Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 124.

the opposite banks, and the bridge at that place, as well C H A P. as all others over the Seine, broken down by orders from Philip. Edward now faw, that the French meant to 1346. enclose him in their country, in hopes of attacking him with advantage on all fides: But he faved himfelf by a stratagem from this perilous situation. He gave his army orders to dislodge, and to advance farther up the Seine; but immediately returning by the fame road, he arrived at Poiffy, which the enemy had already guitted, in order to attend his motions. He repaired the bridge with incredible celerity, paffed over his army, and having thus difengaged himfelf from the enemy, advanced by quick marches towards Flanders. His vanguard, commanded by Harcourt, met with the townsmen of Amiens, who were hastening to reinforce their king, and defeated them with great flaughter 9: He passed by Beauvais, and burned the fuburbs of that city: But as he approached the Somme, he found himself in the same difficulty as before: All the bridges on that river were either broken down, or ftrongly guarded: An army, under the command of Godemar de Faye, was stationed on the opposite banks: Philip was advancing on him from the other quarter, with an army of a hundred thousand men: And he was thus exposed to the danger of being enclosed, and of flarving in an enemy's country. In this extremity, he published a reward to any one, that should bring him intelligence of a passage over the Somme. A peasant, called Gobin Agace, whose name has been preserved by the fhare which he had in these important transactions, was tempted on this occasion to betray the interests of his country; and he informed Edward of a ford below Abbeville, which had a found bottom, and might be passed without difficulty at low water. The king haftened thither, but found Godemar de Faye on the opposite banks.

⁹ Froissard, liv. i. chap. 125

r Ibid. chap. 126, 127.

ani

his

po

hi

threw himself into the river, sword in hand, at the head of his troops; drove the enemy from their station; and pursued them to a distance on the plain. The French army under Philip arrived at the ford, when the rearguard of the English were passing. So narrow was the escape, which Edward, by his prudence and celerity, made from this danger! The rising of the tide prevented the French king from following him over the ford, and obliged that prince to take his route over the bridge at Abbeville; by which some time was lost.

IT is natural to think, that Philip, at the head of fo vast an army, was impatient to take revenge on the English, and to prevent the disgrace, to which he must be exposed, if an inferior enemy should be allowed, after ravaging fo great a part of his kingdom, to escape with impunity. Edward also was sensible, that such must be the object of the French monarch; and as he had advanced but a little way before his enemy, he faw the danger of precipitating his march over the plains of Picardy, and of exposing his rear to the insults of the numerous cavalry, in which the French camp abounded. He took therefore a prudent resolution: He chose his ground with advantage near the village of Crecy; he disposed his army in excellent order; he determined to await in tranquillity the arrival of the enemy; and he hoped, that their eagerness to engage, and to prevent his retreat, after all their past disappointments, would hurry them on to some rash and ill-concerted action. He drew up his army on a gentle afcent, and divided them into three lines: The first was commanded by the prince of Wales, and under him, by the earls of Warwic and Oxford, by Harcourt, and by the lords Chandos, Holland, and other noblemen: The earls of Arundel and

Battle of Crecy. 25th Aug.

Northampton, with the lords Willoughby, Baffet, Roos, C H A.P. and Sir Lewis Tufton, were at the head of the fecond line: He took to himself the command of the third divifion, by which he purposed either to bring succour to the two first lines, or to secure a retreat in case of any misfortune, or to pulh his advantages against the enemy. He had likewise the precaution to throw up trenches on his flanks, in order to fecure himself from the numerous bodies of the French, who might affail him from that quarter; and he placed all his baggage behind him in a wood, which he also secured by an intrenchment .

THE skill and order of this disposition, with the tranquillity in which it was made, ferved extremely to compose the minds of the soldiers; and the king, that he might farther inspirit them, rode through the ranks with fuch an air of cheerfulness and alacrity, as conveyed the highest confidence into every beholder. He pointed out to them the necessity to which they were reduced, and the certain and inevitable destructions which awaited them. if, in their present situation, enclosed on all hands in an enemy's country, they trufted to any thing but their own valour, or gave that enemy an opportunity of taking revenge for the many infults and indignities, which they had of late put upon him. He reminded them of the visible ascendant, which they had hitherto maintained, over all the bodies of French troops that had fallen in their way; and affured them, that the fuperior numbers of the army, which at prefent hovered over them, gave them not greater force, but was an advantage easily compenfated by the order in which he had placed his own army, and the resolution which he expected from them. He demanded nothing, he faid, but that they would imitate his own example, and that of the prince of Wales; and as the honour, the lives, the liberties of all, were

C H A P. now exposed to the fame danger, he was confident, that they would make one common effort to extricate them1346. felves from the present difficulties, and that their united courage would give them the victory over all their enemies.

IT is related by fome historians ", that Edward, besides the refources, which he found in his own genius and prefence of mind, employed also a new invention against the enemy, and placed in his front some pieces of artillery, the first that had yet been made use of on any remarkable occasion in Europe. This is the epoch of one of the most fingular discoveries, that has been made among men; a discovery, which changed by degrees the whole art of war: and by consequence many circumstances in the political government of Europe. But the ignorance of that age, in the mechanical arts, rendered the progrefs of this new invention very flow. The artillery, first framed, were so clumfy and of such difficult management, that men were not immediately sensible of their use and efficacy: And even to the present times, improvements have been continually making on this furious engine, which, though it feemed contrived for the deftruction of mankind, and the overthrow of empires, has in the issue rendered battles less bloody, and has given greater stability to civil focieties. Nations, by its means, have been brought more to a level: Conquefts have become less frequent and rapid: Success in war has been reduced nearly to be a matter of calculation: And any nation, overmatched by its enemies, either yields to their demands, or fecures itself by alliances against their violence and invafion.

THE invention of artillery was at this time known in France as well as in England w; but Philip, in his hurry

and

the

two

broi

lifh

The

flop

imr

for

ma

u Jean Villani, lib. 12. cap. 66. w Du Gang Bombarda.

o overtake the enemy, had probably left his cannon be- C H A P. hind him, which he regarded as a useless incumbrance. All his other movements discovered the same imprudence and precipitation. Impelled by anger, a dangerous counfellor, and trusting to the great superiority of his numbers, he thought that all depended on forcing an engagement with the English, and that, if he could once reach the enemy in their retreat, the victory on his fide was certain and inevitable. He made a hasty march in some confusion from Abbeville; but after he had advanced above two leagues, fome gentlemen, whom he had fent before to take a view of the enemy, returned to him, and brought him intelligence, that they had feen the English drawn up in great order, and awaiting his arrival. They therefore advised him to defer the combat till the ensuing day, when his army would have recovered from their fatigue, and might be disposed into better order, than their present hurry had permitted them to observe. Philip affented to this counsel; but the former precipitation of his march, and the impatience of the French nobility, made it impracticable for him to put it in execution. One division pressed upon another: Orders to ftop were not feasonably conveyed to all of them: This immense body was not governed by sufficient discipline to be manageable: And the French army, imperfectly formed into three lines, arrived, already fatigued and difordered, in presence of the enemy. The first line, confifting of 15,000 Genoese cross-bow men, was commanded by Anthony Doria, and Charles Grimaldi: The fecond was led by the count of Alençon, brother to the king: The king himself was at the head of the third. Besides the French monarch, there were no less than three crowned heads in this engagement: The king of Bohemia, the king of the Romans, his fon, and the king of Majorca; with all the nobility and great vassals of the crown of France. The army now confifted of above Vol. II. Ff 120,000

C H A P. 120,000 men, more than three times the number of the XV. enemy. But the prudence of one man was superior to the advantage of all this force and splendor.

THE English, on the approach of the enemy, kept their ranks firm and immoveable; and the Genoese first began the attack. There had happened, a little before the engagement, a thunder-shower, which had moistened and relaxed the strings of the Genoese cross-bows; their arrows for this reason fell short of the enemy. The English archers, taking their bows out of their cases, poured in a shower of arrows upon this multitude who were opposed to them; and foon threw them into disorder. The Genoese fell back upon the heavy-armed cavalry of the count of Alençon x; who, enraged at their cowardice, ordered his troops to put them to the fword. The artillery fired amidst the crowd; the English archers continued to fend in their arrows among them; and nothing was to be feen in that vast body but hurry and confusion, terror and difmay. The young prince of Wales had the presence of mind to take advantage of this situation, and to lead on his line to the charge. The French cavalry, however, recovering fomewhat their order, and encouraged by the example of their leader, made a flout refistance; and having at last cleared themselves of the Genoese runaways, advanced upon their enemies, and by their superior numbers began to hem them round. The earls of Arundel and Northampton now advanced their line to fustain the prince, who, ardent in his first seats of arms, fet an example of valour, which was imitated by all his followers. The battle became for fome time hot and dangerous, and the earl of Warwic, apprehensive of the event from the superior numbers of the French, dispatched a messenger to the king, and entreated him to send fuccours to the relief of the prince. Edward had chosen his station on the top of the hill; and he surveyed in tranoul.

or W

unf

repel prin

rage

the

Th

The

cut ter ;

1

to f

en

val

unc

201

Wh

bin

bat

fol

m

pu

M

quillity the scene of action. When the messenger accosted C H A P. him, his first question was, whether the prince were slain or wounded. On receiving an answer in the negative, Return, faid he, to my fon, and tell him that I referve the honour of the day to him: I am confident that he will show himself worthy of the honour of knighthood, which I so lately conferred upon him: He will be able without my affistance to repel the enemy r. This speech, being reported to the prince and his attendants, inspired them with fresh courage: They made an attack with redoubled vigour on the French, in which the count of Alençon was flain: That whole line of cavalry was thrown into diforder: The riders were killed or dismounted: The Welsh infantry rushed into the throng, and with their long knives cut the throats of all who had fallen; nor was any quarter given that day by the victors z.

THE king of France advanced in vain with the rear to fustain the line commanded by his brother: He found them already discomfitted; and the example of their rout encreased the confusion, which was before but too prevalent in his own body. He had himself a horse killed under him: He was remounted; and, though left almost alone, he feemed still determined to maintain the combat; when John of Hainault seized the reins of his bridle, turned about his horse, and carried him off the field of battle. The whole French army took to flight, and was followed and put to the fword without mercy by the enemy; till the darkness of the night put an end to the pursuit. The king, on his return to the camp, flew into the arms of the prince of Wales, and exclaimed; My brave son: Persevere in your honourable cause: You are my fon; for valiantly have you acquitted yourfelf to-day: You have shewn yourself worthy of empire a.

Froisfard, liv. i. chap. 130. Z Ibid.

a Ibid. chap. 131.

CHAP. THIS battle, which is known by the name of the battle of Crecy, began after three o'clock in the afternoon. and continued till evening. The next morning was foggy; and as the English observed, that many of the enemy had lost their way in the night and in the mist, they employed a stratagem to bring them into their power: They erected on the eminences fome French standards which they had taken in the battle; and all, who were allured by this false signal, were put to the fword, and no quarter given them. In excuse for this inhumanity, it was alleged that the French king had given like orders to his troops; but the real reason probably was, that the English, in their present situation, did not chuse to be encumbered with prisoners. On the day of battle, and on the enfuing, there fell, by a moderate computation, 1200 French knights, 1400 gentlemen, 4000 men at arms, besides about 30,000 of inferior rank b: Many of the principal nobility of France, the dukes of Lorraine and Bourbon, the earls of Flanders, Blois, Vaudemont, Aumale, were left on the field of battle. The kings also of Bohemia and Majorca were flain: The fate of the former was remarkable: He was blind from age; but being refolved to hazard his perfon, and fet an example to others, he ordered the reins of his bridle to be tied on each fide to the horses of two gentlemen of his train; and his dead body, and those of his attendants, were afterwards found among the flain, with their horses standing by them in that situation c. His creft was three oftrich feathers; and his motto these German words, Ich dien, I serve: Which the prince of Wales and his fucceffors adopted in memorial of this great victory. The action may feem no lefs remarkable for the small loss sustained by the English than for the great flaughter of the French: There were killed in it only

500

ned I

1

pro

10

onl

mig

tagi

trat

in pr.

an

b Froissard, liv. i. chap 131. Knyghton, p. 2588. liv. i. chap. 130. Walfingham, p. 166.

one esquire and three knights 4, and very sew of inferior C H A P. rank; a demonstration, that the prudent disposition planned by Edward, and the disorderly attack made by the French, had rendered the whole rather a rout than a battle, which was indeed the common case with engagements in those times.

THE great prudence of Edward appeared not only in obtaining this memorable victory, but in the measures which he purfued after it. Not elated by his present prosperity, so far as to expect the total conquest of France, or even that of any confiderable provinces; he purposed only to fecure fuch an easy entrance into that kingdom, as might afterwards open the way to more moderate advantages. He knew the extreme distance of Guienne: He had experienced the difficulty and uncertainty of penetrating on the fide of the Low Countries, and had already loft much of his authority over Flanders by the death of d'Arteville, who had been murdered by the populace themselves, his former partizans, on his attempting to transfer the fovereignty of that province to the prince of Wales c. The king, therefore, limited his ambition to the conquest of Calais; and after the interval of a few days, which he employed in interring the flain, he marched with his victorious army, and prefented himself before the place.

JOHN of Vienne, a valiant knight of Burgundy, was governor of Calais, and being supplied with every thing necessary for defence, he encouraged the townsmen to perform to the utmost their duty to their king and country. Edward therefore, sensible from the beginning that it was in vain to attempt the place by force, purposed only to reduce it by famine: He chose a secure station for his camp; drew entrenchments around the whole city; raised huts for his soldiers, which he covered

d Knyghton, p. 2588.

pri

CTE

62

for

be pro

up

be

WZ

gr

C H A P. with straw or broom; and provided his army with all the conveniencies, necessary to make them endure the winter season, which was approaching. As the governor soon perceived his intention, he expelled all the useless mouths; and the king had the generosity to allow these unhappy people to pass through his camp, and he even supplied them with money for their journey.

WHILE Edward was engaged in this fiege, which employed him near a twelvemonth, there passed in different places many other events; and all to the honour of the English arms.

THE retreat of the duke of Normandy from Guienne left the earl of Derby mafter of the field; and he was not negligent in making his advantage of the fuperiority. He took Mirebeau by affault: He made himfelf mafter of Lufignan in the fame manner: Taillebourg and St. Jean d'Angeli fell into his hands: Poictiers opened its gates to him; and Derby having thus broken into the frontiers on that quarter, carried his incursions to the banks of the Loire, and filled all the fouthern provinces of France with horror and devastation s.

THE flames of war were at the same time kindled in Britanny. Charles of Blois invaded that province with a considerable army, and invested the fortress of Roche de Rien; but the countess of Mountsort, reinforced by some English troops under Sir Thomas Dagworth, attacked him during the night in his entrenchments, dispersed his army, and took Charles himself prisoner h. His wife, by whom he enjoyed his pretensions to Britanny, compelled by the present necessity, took on her the government of the party, and proved herself a rival in every shape, and an antagonish to the countess of Mountsort, both in the field and in the cabinet. And while these heroic dames presented this extraordinary scene to the world, another

f Froisfard, liv. i, chap. 133. g Ibid. chap. 136. h Ibid. chap. 143. Walfingham, p. 168. Ypod. Neuft. p. 517, 518. princess princess in England, of still higher rank, showed herself C H A P. no less capable of exerting every manly virtue.

10

THE Scottish nation, after long defending, with in- War with credible perfeverance, their liberties against the fuperior Scotland. force of the English, recalled their king, David Bruce, in 1342. Though that prince, neither by his age nor . capacity, could bring them great affiftance, he gave them the countenance of fovereign authority; and as Edward's wars on the continent proved a great diversion to the force of England, they rendered the balance more equal between the kingdoms. In every truce which Edward concluded with Philip, the king of Scotland was comprehended: and when Edward made his last invasion upon France, David was strongly solicited by his ally to begin also hostilities, and to invade the northern counties of England. The nobility of his nation being always forward in fuch incursions, David soon mustered a great army, entered Northumberland at the head of above 50,000 men, and carried his ravages and devastations to the gates of Durham i. But queen Philippa, affembling a body of little more than 12,000 men k, which she entrusted to the command of Lord Piercy, ventured to approach him at Neville's Cross near that city; and riding through the ranks of her army, exhorted every man to do his duty, and to take revenge on these barbarous ravagers 1. Nor could she be perfuaded to leave the field, till the ar- 17th Octo mies were on the point of engaging. The Scots have often been unfortunate in the great pitched battles which they fought with the English; even though they commonly declined such engagements where the superiority of numbers was not on their fide: But never did they receive a more fatal blow than the present. They were broken and chaced off the field: Fifteen thousand of them, some i Froissard, liv. 1. chap. 137.

k Ibid. chap. #38.

¹ Ibid. chap. 138.

C H A P. historians say twenty thousand, were slain; among whom were Edward Keith, earl Mareschal, and Sir Thomas Captivity of Charteris, chancellor: And the king himself was taken the king of prisoner, with the earls of Southerland, Fife, Monteith, Scots.

Carric, lord Douglas, and many other noblemen m.

PHILIPPA, having secured her royal prisoner in the Tower, crossed the sea at Dover; and was received in the English camp before Calais with all the triumph due to her rank, her merit, and her success. This age was the reign of chivalry and gallantry: Edward's court excelled in these accomplishments as much as in policy and arms: And if any thing could justify the obsequious devotion then professed to the fair sex, it must be the appearance of such extraordinary women as shone forth during that period.

Calais taken. The town of Calais had been defended with remarkable vigilance, constancy, and bravery by the townsmen, during a siege of unusual length: But Philip, informed of their distressed condition, determined at last to attempt their relief; and he approached the English with an immense army, which the writers of that age make amount to 200,000 men. But he found Edward so surrounded with morasses, and secured by entrenchments, that, without running on inevitable destruction, he concluded it impossible to make an attempt on the English camp. He had no other resource than to send his rival a vain challenge to meet him in the open field; which being refused, he was obliged to decamp with his army, and disperse them into their several provinces.

JOHN OF VIENNE, governor of Calais, now faw the necessity of furrendering his fortress, which was reduced

m Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 139. n Rymer, vol. v. p. 537.

[·] Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 144, 145. Avesbury, p. 161, 162.

J347-

to the last extremity, by famine and the fatigue of the C H A P. inhabitants. He appeared on the walls, and made a fignal to the English centinels that he defired a parley. Sir Walter Manny was fent to him by Edward. " Brave " knight," cried the governor, " I have been entrusted by my fovereign with the command of this town: It " is almost a year fince you besieged me; and I have endeavoured, as well as those under me, to do our 66 duty. But you are acquainted with our present condition: We have no hopes of relief; we are perishing 6 with hunger; I am willing therefore to furrender, and 66 defire, as the fole condition, to enfure the lives and 66 liberties of these brave men, who have so long shared " with me every danger and fatigue p."

MANNY replied, that he was well acquainted with the intentions of the king of England; that that prince was incensed against the townsmen of Calais for their pertinacious refistance, and for the evils which they had made him and his subjects suffer; that he was determined to take exemplary vengeance on them; and would not receive the town on any condition which should confine him in the punishment of these offenders. "Consider," replied Vienne, "that this is not the treatment to which 66 brave men are intitled: If any English knight had 66 been in my fituation, your king would have expected the same conduct from him. The inhabitants of Ca-66 lais have done for their fovereign what merits the ef-" teem of every prince; much more of fo gallant a prince as Edward. But I inform you, that, if we must perish, we shall not perish unrevenged; and that we are not 66 yet so reduced, but we can fell our lives at a high price to the victors. It is the interest of both sides to prebe vent these desperate extremities; and I expect, that

C H A P. " you yourself, brave knight, will interpose your good xv. " offices with your prince in our behalf."

MANNY was struck with the instruction of the form

Manny was struck with the justness of these sentiments, and represented to the king the danger of reprisals, if he should give such treatment to the inhabitants of Calais. Edward was at last persuaded to mitigate the rigour of the conditions demanded: He only insisted, that six of the most considerable citizens should be sent to him to be disposed of as he thought proper; that they should come to his camp carrying the keys of the city in their hands, bareheaded and barefooted, with ropes about their necks.: And on these conditions, he promised to spare the lives of all the remainder 4.

WHEN this intelligence was conveyed to Calais, it struck the inhabitants with new consternation. To sacrifice fix of their fellow-citizens to certain destruction, for fignalizing their valour in a common cause, appeared to them even more severe than that general punishment, with which they were before threatened; and they found themselves incapable of coming to any resolution in so cruel and diffressful a situation. At last one of the principal inhabitants called Eustace de St. Pierre, whose name deferves to be recorded, stepped forth, and declared himfelf willing to encounter death for the fafety of his friends and companions: Another, animated by his example, made a like generous offer: A third and a fourth prefented themselves to the same fate; and the whole number was foon completed. These fix heroic burgesses appeared before Edward in the guife of malefactors, laid at his feet the keys of their city, and were ordered to be led to execution. It is furprizing, that so generous a prince should ever have entertained fuch a barbarous purpose against fuch men; and still more that he should seriously persist in the resolution of executing it *. But the entreaties C H A P. of his queen faved his memory from that infamy: She threw herfelf on her knees before him, and with tears in her eyes begged the lives of these citizens. Having obtained her request, she carried them into her tent, ordered a repast to be set before them, and after making them a present of money and clothes, dismissed them in safety r.

1347-

THE king took possession of Calais; and immediately 4th August. executed an act of rigor, more justifiable because more necessary, than that which he had before resolved on. He knew, that, notwithstanding his pretended title to the crown of France, every Frenchman regarded him as a mortal enemy: He therefore ordered all the inhabitants of Calais to evacuate the town, and he peopled it anew with English; a policy which probably preferved so long to his fuccessors the dominion of that important fortress. He made it the staple of wool, leather, tin, and lead; the four chief, if not the fole commodities of the kingdom, for which there was any confiderable demand in foreign markets. All the English were obliged to bring thither these goods: Foreign merchants came to the same place in order to purchase them: And at a period, when posts were not established, and when the communication between states was so imperfect, this institution, though it hurt the navigation of England, was probably of advantage to the kingdom.

THROUGH the mediation of the pope's legates, Edward concluded a truce with France; but even during this ceffation of arms, he had very nearly lost Calais, the fole fruit of all his boafted victories. The king had entrusted that place to Aimery de Pavie, an Italian, who had discovered bravery and conduct in the wars,

¥348.

^{*} See note [H] at the end of the volume.

t Froisfard, liv. 1. chap, 146.

wi

DOV

Wi

an

CHAP. but was utterly destitute of every principle of honour and fidelity. This man agreed to deliver up Calais for the fum of 20,000 crowns; and Geoffrey de Charni, who 1348. commanded the French forces in those quarters, and who knew, that, if he succeeded in this service, he should not be disavowed, ventured, without consulting his master, to conclude the bargain with him. Edward, informed of this treachery, by means of Aimery's fecretary, fummoned the governor to London on other pretences; and having charged him with the guilt, promifed him his life, but on condition that he would turn the contrivance to the de-Aruction of the enemy. The Italian eafily agreed to this double treachery. A day was appointed for the admission of the French; and Edward, having prepared a force of about a thousand men, under Sir Walter Manny, secretly departed from London, carrying with him the prince of Wales; and without being suspected, arrived the evening before at Calais. He made a proper disposition for the reception of the enemy; and kept all his forces and the garrison under arms. On the appearance of Charni, a chosen band of French soldiers was admitted at the postern, and Aimery, receiving the stipulated sum, promifed, that, with their affiftance, he would immediately open the great gate to the troops, who were waiting with impatience for the fulfilling of his engagement. All the French who entered were immediately flain or taken prifoners: The great gate opened: Edward rushed forth with cries of battle and of victory: 'The French, though aftonished at the event, behaved with valour: A fierce and bloody engagement enfued. As the morning broke, the king, who was not diftinguished by his arms, and who fought as a private man under the standard of Sir Walter Manny, remarked a French gentleman, called Eustace de Ribaumont, who exerted himself with singular vigour and bravery; and he was feized with a defire of trying a fingle combat with him. He stepped forth from his troop, and challenging challenging Ribaumont by name, (for he was known to C H A P. him) began a sharp and dangerous encounter. He was twice beaten to the ground by the valour of the Frenchman: He twice recovered himself: Blows were redoubled with equal force on both fides: The victory was long undecided: Till Ribaumont, perceiving himself to be left almost alone, called out to his antagonist, Sir knight, I yield myself your prisoner; and at the same time delivered his fword to the king. Most of the French, being overpowered by numbers, and intercepted in their retreat, lost either their lives or their liberty ..

1349. 1ft Jan.

THE French officers, who had fallen into the hands of the English, were conducted into Calais; where Edward discovered to them the antagonist with whom they had had the honour to be engaged, and treated them with great regard and courtefy. They were admitted to sup with the prince of Wales, and the English nobility; and after fupper, the king himself came into the apartment, and went about, converfing familiarly with one or other of his prisoners. He even addressed himself to Charni, and avoided reproaching him, in too fevere terms, with the treacherous attempt, which he had made upon Calais during the truce: But he openly bestowed the highest encomiums on Ribaumont; called him the most valorous knight that he had ever been acquainted with; and confessed, that he himself had at no time been in so great danger as when engaged in combat with him. He then took a string of pearls, which he wore about his own head, and throwing it over the head of Ribaumont, he faid to him, "Sir Eustace, I bestow this present upon 66 you, as a testimony of my esteem for your bravery: " And I desire you to wear it a year for my sake: I 66 know you to be gay and amorous; and to take delight in the company of ladies and damfels: Let them all

s Froiffard, liv. 1. cl ap. 140, 141, 142.

C H A P. 66 know from what hand you had the prefent: You are "no longer a prisoner; I acquit you of your ransom;

and you are at liberty to-morrow to dispose of your felf as you think proper."

Nothing proves more evidently the vaft fuperiority affumed by the nobility and gentry above all the other orders of men during those ages, than the extreme difference which Edward made in his treatment of these French knights, and that of the fix citizens of Calais, who had exerted more fignal bravery in a cause more justifiable and more honourable.

CHAP. XVI. EDWARDIII.

Institution of the garter —— State of France ——

Battile of Poictiers —— Captivity of the king of France —— State of that kingdom —— Invasion of France —— Peace of Bretigni —— State of France —— Expedition into Castile —— Rupture with France —— Ill success of the English —— Death of the prince of Wales —— Death —— and character of the king —— Miscellaneous transactions in this reign.

HE prudent conduct and great success of Edward C H A P. in his foreign wars had excited a ftrong emulation and a military genius among the English nobility; and 1349. these turbulent barons, over-awed by the crown, gave now a more useful direction to their ambition, and attached themselves to a prince who led them to the acquifition of riches and of glory. That he might farther Inditution promote the spirit of emulation and obedience, the king of the garinstituted the order of the garter, in imitation of some orders of a like nature, religious as well as military, which had been established in different parts of Europe. The number received into this order confifted of twentyfive persons, besides the sovereign; and as it has never been enlarged, this badge of distinction continues as horourable as at its first institution, and is still a valuable, though a cheap, present, which the prince can confer on his greatest subjects. A vulgar story prevails, but is not supported by any ancient authority, that, at a courtball,

CHAP. ball, Edward's mistress, commonly supposed to be the counters of Salifbury, dropped her garter; and the king. 1349. taking it up, observed some of the courtiers to smile, as if they thought that he had not obtained this favour merely by accident: Upon which he called out, Honi foit qui mal y pense, Evil to him that evil thinks; and as every incident of gallantry among those ancient warriors was magnified into a matter of great importance *, he inftituted the order of the garter in memorial of this event, and gave these words as the motto of the order. This origin, though frivolous, is not unfuitable to the manners of the times; and it is indeed difficult by any other means to account, either for the feemingly unmeaning terms of the motto, or for the peculiar badge of the garter, which feems to have no reference to any purpose either of military use or ornament.

But a fudden damp was thrown over this festivity and triumph of the court of England, by a destructive pestilence, which invaded that kingdom as well as the rest of Europe; and is computed to have swept away near a third of the inhabitants in every country, which it attacked. It was probably more fatal in great cities than in the country; and above fifty thousand souls are faid to have perished by it in London alone t. This malady first discovered itself in the north of Asia, was spread over all that country, made its progress from one end of Europe to the other, and sensibly depopulated every state through which it passed. So grievous a calamity, more than the pacific disposition of the princes, served to maintain and prolong the truce between France and England.

^{*} See note [I] at the end of the volume.

t Stowe's Survey, p. 478. There were buried 50,000 bodies in one churchyard, which Sir Walter Manny had bought for the use of the poor. The same author says, that there died above 50,000 persons of the plague in Norwich, which is quite incredible,

13500

DURING this truce, Philip de Valois died, without C H A P. being able to re-establish the affairs of France, which his bad success against England had thrown into extreme disorder. This monarch, during the first years of his reign, had obtained the appellation of Fortunate, and acquired the character of prudent; but he ill maintained either the one or the other; less from his own fault, than because he was overmatched by the superior fortune and fuperior genius of Edward. But the incidents in the reign of his fon John, gave the French nation cause to regret even the calamitous times of his predecessor. John was diffinguished by many virtues, particularly a scrupulous honour and fidelity: He was not deficient in perfonal courage: But as he wanted that masterly prudence and forefight, which his difficult fituation required, his kingdom was at the fame time diffurbed by intestine commotions, and oppressed with foreign wars. The chief 1354. fource of its calamities, was Charles king of Navarre, France. who received the epithet of the bad or wicked, and whose conduct fully entitled him to that appellation. This prince was descended from males of the blood royal of France; his mother was daughter of Lewis Hutin; he had himfelf espoused a daughter of king John: But all these ties, which ought to have connected him with the throne, gave him only greater power to shake and overthrow it. With regard to his perfonal qualities, he was courteous, affable, engaging, eloquent; full of infinuation and address; inexhauftible in his resources; active and enterprising. But these splendid accomplishments were attended with such defects, as rendered them pernicious to his country, and even ruinous to himself: He was volatile, inconstant, faithless, revengeful, malicious: Restrained by no principle or duty: Infatiable in his pretenfions: And whether fuccessful or unfortunate in one enterprize, he immediately undertook another, in which he was never deterred VOL. II. Gg

C H A F. deterred from employing the most criminal and most dishonourable expedients.

1354.

THE constable of Eu, who had been taken prisoner by Edward at Caen, recovered his liberty, on the promise of delivering as his ranfom, the town of Guifnes, near Calais, of which he was superior lord: But as John was offended at this stipulation, which, if fulfilled, opened still farther that frontier to the enemy, and as he suspected the constable of more dangerous connexions with the king of England, he ordered him to be seized, and without any legal or formal trial, put him to death in prison. Charles de la Cerda was appointed constable in his place; and had a like fatal end: The king of Navarre ordered him to be affaffinated; and fuch was the weakness of the crown, that this prince, instead of dreading punishment, would not even agree to ask pardon for his offence, but on condition that he should receive an accession of territory: And he had also John's second son put into his hands, as a fecurity for his person, when he came to court, and performed this act of mock penitence and humiliation before his fovereign ".

1355.

The two French princes seemed entirely reconciled; but this dissimulation, to which John submitted from necessity, and Charles from habit, did not long continue; and the king of Navarre knew, that he had reason to apprehend the most severe vengeance for the many crimes and treasons, which he had already committed, and the still greater, which he was meditating. To ensure himself of protection, he entered into a secret correspondence with England, by means of Henry earl of Derby, now earl of Lancaster, who at that time was employed in fruit-less negociations for peace at Avignon, under the mediation of the pope. John detected this correspondence; and to prevent the dangerous effects of it, he sent forces C H A P. into Normandy, the chief feat of the king of Navarre's power, and attacked his castles and fortresses. But hearing that Edward had prepared an army to support his ally, he had the weakness to propose an accommodation with Charles, and even to give this traiterous subject the sum of a hundred thousand crowns, as the purchase of a feigned reconcilement, which rendered him still more dangerous. The king of Navarre, infolent from past impunity, and desperate from the dangers which he apprehended, continued his intrigues; and affociating himfelf with Geoffrey d'Harcourt, who had received his pardon from Philip de Valois, but persevered still in his factious disposition, he encreased the number of his partizans in every part of the kingdom. He even feduced by his addrefs, Charles, the king of France's eldest fon, a youth of seventeen years of age, who was the first that bore the appellation of Dauphin, by the re-union of the province of Dauphiny to the crown. But this prince, being made fensible of the danger and folly of these connexions, promifed to make atonement for the offence by the facrifice of his affociates; and in concert with his father, he invited the king of Navarre, and other noblemen of the party, to a feaft at Rouen, where they were betrayed into the hands of John. Some of the most obnoxious were immediately led to execution; the king of Navarre was thrown into prison w: But this stroke of severity in the king, and of treachery in the Dauphin, was far from proving decifive in maintaining the royal authority. Philip of Navarre, brother to Chailes, and Geoffroy d'Harcourt, put all the towns and castles belonging to that prince in a posture of defence; and had immediate recourse to the protection of England in this desperate extremity.

[&]quot; Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 144.

> w Froisfard, live i. chap. 146. Avesbury, p. 243. Gg 2

ways been ill observed on both sides, was now expired; and Edward was entirely free to support the French malcontents. Well pleased, that the sactions in France had at length gained him some partizans in that kingdom, which his pretensions to the crown had never been able to accomplish, he purposed to attack his enemy both on the side of Guienne, under the command of the prince of Wales, and on that of Calais, in his own person.

Young Edward arrived in the Garronne with his army, on board a fleet of three hundred fail, attended by the earls of Warwic, Salifbury, Oxford, Suffolk, and other English noblemen. Being joined by the vaffals of Gafcony, he took the field; and as the present disorders in France prevented every proper plan of defence, he carried on with impunity his ravages and devastations, according to the mode of war in that age. He reduced all the villages and several towns in Languedoc to ashes: He presented himself before Toulouse; passed the Garronne, and burned the fuburbs of Carcassonne; advanced even to Narbonne, laying every place waste around him: And after an incursion of fix weeks, returned with a vast booty and many prisoners to Guienne, where he took up his winter-quarters x. The constable of Bourbon, who commanded in those provinces, received orders, though at the head of a superior army, on no account to run the hazard of a battle.

THE king of England's incursion from Calais was of the fame nature, and attended with the fame issue. He broke into France at the head of a numerous army; to which he gave a full licence of plundering and ravaging the open country. He advanced to St. Omer, where the king of France was posted; and on the retreat of that prince, followed him to Hesdin y. John still kept at a C H A P. distance, and declined an engagement: But in order to fave his reputation, he fent Edward a challenge to fight a pitched battle with him; a usual bravadoe in that age, derived from the practice of fingle combat, and ridiculous in the art of war. The king, finding no fincerity in this defiance, retired to Calais, and thence went over to England, in order to defend that kingdom against a threatened invalion of the Scots.

^{*} Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 144. 146.

THE Scots, taking advantage of the king's absence. and that of the military power of England, had surprized Berwic; and had collected an army with a view of committing ravages upon the northern provinces: But on the approach of Edward, they abandoned that place, which was not tenable, while the castle was in the hands of the English; and retiring to their mountains, gave the enemy full liberty of burning and destroying the whole country from Berwic to Edinburgh z. Baliol attended Edward on this expedition; but finding, that his constant adherence to the English had given his countrymen an unconquerable aversion to his title, and that he himself was declining through age and infirmities, he finally refigned into the king's hands his pretentions to the crown of Scotland a, and received in lieu of them an annual pension of 2000 pounds, with which he passed the remainder of his life in privacy and retirement.

DURING these military operations, Edward received information of the encreasing disorders in France, arising from the imprisonment of the king of Navarre; and he fent Lancaster at the head of a small army, to support the partizans of that prince in Normandy. The war was conducted with various success; but chiefly to the difadvantage of the French malcontents; till an important

y Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 144. Avesbury, p. 206. Walfing. p. 171.

² Rymer, vol. v. p. 823. Ypod. Neuft. z Walfing. p. 171.

C H A P. event happened in the other quarter of the kingdom, which had well nigh proved fatal to the monarchy of France, and threw every thing into the utmost confusion.

1356.

THE prince of Wales, encouraged by the fuccess of the preceding campaign, took the field with an army, which no historian makes amount to above 12,000 men, and of which not a third were English; and with this small body, he ventured to penetrate into the heart of France. After ravaging the Agenois, Quercy, and the Limoufin, he entered the province of Berry; and made some attacks, though without fuccefs, on the towns of Bourges and Isloudun. It appeared, that his intentions were to march into Normandy, and to join his forces with those of the earl of Lancaster, and the partizans of the king of Navarre; but finding all the bridges on the Loire broken down, and every pass carefully guarded, he was obliged to think of making his retreat into Guienne b. He found this resolution the more necessary, from the intelligence which he received of the king of France's motions. That monarch, provoked at the infult offered him by this incursion, and entertaining hopes of success from the young prince's temerity, collected a great army of above 60,000 men, and advanced by hafty marches to intercept his enemy. The prince, not aware of John's near approach, lost some days, on his retreat, before the castle of Remorantin c; and thereby gave the French an opportunity of overtaking him. They came within fight at Maupertuis near Poictiers; and Edward, sensible that his retreat was now become impracticable, prepared for battle with all the courage of a young hero, and with all the prudence of the oldest and most experienced commander.

Battle of Poictiers.

> But the utmost prudence and courage would have proved insufficient to save him in this extremity, had the b Walfing. p. 171.

Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 158. Walfing.

king of France known how to make use of his present C H A P. advantages. His great superiority in numbers enabled him to furround the enemy; and by intercepting all provisions, which were already become scarce in the English camp, to reduce this fmall army, without a blow, to the necessity of furrendering at discretion. But such was the impatient ardour of the French nobility, and so much had their thoughts been bent on overtaking the English as their fole object, that this idea never struck any of the commanders; and they immediately took measures for the affault, as for a certain victory. While the French army was drawn up in order of battle, they were stopped by the appearance of the cardinal of Perigord; who having learned the approach of the two armies to each other, had haftened, by interpofing his good offices, to prevent any farther effusion of Christian blood. By John's permission, he carried proposals to the prince of Wales; and found him fo fensible of the bad posture of his affairs, that an accommodation feemed not impracticable. Edward told him, that he would agree to any terms confiftent with his own honour and that of England; and he offered to purchase a retreat by ceding all the conquests, which he had made during this and the former campaign, and by stipulating not to serve against France; during the course of seven years. But John, imagining that he had now got into his hands a fufficient pledge for the restitution of Calais, required that Edward should furrender himself prisoner with a hundred of his attendants; and offered on these terms a fase retreat to the English army. The prince rejected the proposal with disdain; and declared, that, whatever fortune might attend him, England frould never be obliged to pay the price of his ranfom. This resolute answer cut off all hopes of accommodation; but as the day was already fpent Gg 4

C H A P spent in negociating, the battle was delayed till the next morning d.

The cardinal of Perigond as did all the areal to find

THE cardinal of Perigord, as did all the prelates of the court of Rome, bore a great attachment to the French interest; but the most determined enemy could not, by any expedient, have done a greater prejudice to John's affairs, 19th Sept, than he did them by this delay. The prince of Wales had leisure, during the night, to strengthen, by new intrenchments, the post which he had before so judiciously chosen; and he contrived an ambush of 300 men at arms, and as many archers, whom he put under the command of the Captal de Buche, and ordered to make a circuit, that they might fall on the flank or rear of the French army during the engagement. The van of his army was commanded by the earl of Warwic, the rear by the earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, the main body by the prince himself. The lords Chandos, Audeley, and many other brave and experienced commanders, were at the head of different corps of his army.

John also arranged his forces in three divisions, nearly equal: The first was commanded by the duke of Orleans, the king's brother; the second by the Dauphin attended by his two younger brothers; the third by the king himfelf, who had by his side Philip, his fourth son and favourite, then about sourteen years of age. There was no reaching the English army but through a narrow lane, covered on each side by hedges; and in order to open this passage, the mareschals, Andrehen and Clermont, were ordered to advance with a separate detachment of men at arms. While they marched along the lane, a body of English archers, who lined the hedges, plyed them on each side with their arrows; and being very near them, yet placed in persect safety, they coolly took their aim against the enemy, and saughtered them with impunity.

d Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 161.

The French detachment, much discouraged by the un-C H A P. equal combat, and diminished in their number, arrived at the end of the lane, where they met on the open ground the prince of Wales himfelf, at the head of a chosen body, ready for their reception. They were discomfitted and overthrown: One of the mareschals was flain; the other taken prisoner: And the remainder of the detachment. who were still in the lane, and exposed to the shot of the enemy, without being able to make refiftance, recoiled upon their own army, and put every thing into disorder e. In that critical moment, the Captal de Buche unexpectedly appeared, and attacked in flank the Dauphin's line, which fell into some confusion. Landas, Bodenai, and St. Venant, to whom the care of that young prince and his brothers had been committed, too anxious for their charge or for their own fafety, carried them off the field, and fet the example of flight, which was followed by that whole division. The duke of Orleans, seized with a like panic, and imagining all was loft, thought no longer of fighting, but carried off his division by a retreat, which foon turned into a flight. Lord Chandos called out to the prince, that the day was won; and encouraged him to attack the division, under king John, which, though more numerous than the whole Englifh army, were fomewhat difmayed with the precipitate flight of their companions. John here made the utmost efforts to retrieve by his valour, what his imprudence had betrayed; and the only relistance made that day was by his line of battle. The prince of Wales fell with impetuofity on some German cavalry placed in the front, and commanded by the counts of Sallebruche, Nydo, and Nosto: A fierce battle ensued: One side were encouraged by the near prospect of so great a victory: The other were stimulated by the shame of quitting the field to an

e Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 162.

458

C H A P. enemy fo much inferior: But the three German generals, together with the duke of Athens, constable of France. falling in battle, that body of cavalry gave way, and left 1356. the king himself exposed to the whole fury of the enemy. The ranks were every moment thinned around him: The nobles fell by his fide, one after another: His fon, scarce fourteen years of age, received a wound, while he was fighting valiantly in defence of his father: The king himself, spent with fatigue, and overwhelmed by numbers, might eafily have been flain; but every English gentleman, ambitious of taking alive the royal prisoner, spared him in the action, exhorted him to surrender, and offered him quarter: Several who attempted to feize him, fuffered for their temerity. He still cried out, Where is my cousin, the prince of Wales? and seemed unwilling to become prisoner to any person of inferior rank.

sprivity of But being told, that the prince was at a distance on the le king of field, he threw down his gauntlet, and yielded himself to Dennis de Morbec, a knight of Arras, who had been obliged to fly his country for murder. His son was taken with him f.

The prince of Wales, who had been carried away in pursuit of the slying enemy, finding the field entirely clear, had ordered a tent to be pitched, and was reposing himself after the toils of battle; enquiring still with great anxiety concerning the fate of the French monarch. He dispatched the earl of Warwic to bring him intelligence; and that nobleman came happily in time to save the life of the captive prince, which was exposed to greater danger than it had been during the heat of action. The English had taken him by violence from Morbec: The Gascons claimed the honour of detaining the royal prisoner: And some brutal soldiers, rather than yield the prize to their rivals, had threatened to put him to death s.

E Froiffard, liv. 1. chap: 164.

f Rymer, vol. vi. p. 72. 154. Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 164.

Warwic overawed both parties, and approaching the C H A P. king with great demonstrations of respect, offered to conduct him to the prince's tent.

HERE commences the real and truly admirable heroifm of Edward: For victories are vulgar things in comparison of that moderation and humanity displayed by a young prince of twenty-feven years of age, not yet cooled from the fury of battle, and elated by as extraordinary and as unexpected fuccess as had ever crowned the arms of any commander. He came forth to meet the captive king with all the marks of regard and fympathy; administered comfort to him amidst his misfortunes; paid him the tribute of praise due to his valour; and ascribed his own victory merely to the blind chance of war or to a superior providence, which controuls all the efforts of human force and prudence h. The behaviour of John showed him not unworthy of this courteous treatment: His prefent abject fortune never made him forget a moment that he was a king: More touched by Edward's generofity than by his own calamities, he confessed, that, notwithstanding his defeat and captivity, his honour was still unimpaired; and that, if he yielded the victory, it was at least gained by a prince of fuch confummate valour and humanity.

EDWARD ordered a repast to be prepared in his tent for the prisoner; and he himself served at the royal captive's table, as if he had been one of his retinue: He stood at the king's back during the meal; constantly refused to take a place at table; and declared, that, being a subject, he was too well acquainted with the distance between his own rank, and that of royal majesty, to assume such freedom. All his father's pretensions to the crown of France were now buried in oblivion: John in captivity received the honours of a king, which were resulted him when seated on the throne: His missortunes, not his title, were respected; and the French prisoners,

460

L HAP. conquered by this elevation of mind, more than by their late discomfiture, burst into tears of admiration; which were only checked by the reslection, that such genuine and unaltered heroism in an enemy must certainly in the issue prove but the more dangerous to their native country.

ALL the English and Gascon knights imitated the generous example set them by their prince. The captives were every where treated with humanity, and were soon after dismissed on paying moderate ransoms to the persons into whose hands they had fallen. The extent of their fortunes was considered; and an attention was given, that they should still have sufficient means lest to perform their military service in a manner suitable to their rank and quality. Yet so numerous were the noble prisoners, that these ransoms, added to the spoils, gained in the field, were sufficient to enrich the princes army; and as they had suffered very little in the action, their joy and exultation was complete.

THE prince of Wales conducted his prisoner to Bourdeaux; and not being provided with forces fo numerous as might enable him to push his present advantages, he concluded a two years' truce with France k, which was also become requisite, that he might conduct the captive king with fafety into England. He landed at Southwark, and was met by a great concourse of people, of all ranks and flations. The prisoner was clad in royal ap-24th May. parel, and mounted on a white steed, distinguished by its fize and beauty, and by the richness of its furniture. The conqueror rode by his fide in a meaner attire, and carried by a black palfry. In this fituation, more glorious than all the infolent parade of a Roman triumph, he passed through the streets of London, and presented the king of France to his father, who advanced to meet him, and received him with the same courtesy, as if he had C H A P. been a neighbouring potentate, that had voluntarily come to pay him a friendly visit. It is impossible, in reflecting on this noble conduct, not to perceive the advantages, which resulted from the otherwise whimsical principles of chivalry, and which gave men, in those rude times, some superiority even over people of a more cultivated age and nation.

i Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 168.

k Rymer, vol. vi. p. 3.

THE king of France, besides the generous treatment which he met with in England, had the melancholy confolation of the wretched, to see companions in affliction. The king of Scots had been eleven years a captive in Edward's hands; and the good fortune of this latter monarch had reduced at once the two neighbouring potentates, with whom he was engaged in war, to be prifoners in his capital. But Edward, finding that the conquest of Scotland was nowise advanced by the captivity of its sovereign, and that the government, conducted by Robert Stuart, his nephew and heir, was still able to defend itself, consented to restore David Bruce to his liberty, for the ransom of 100,000 marks sterling; and that prince delivered the sons of all his principal nobility, as hostages for the payment m.

MEANWHILE, the captivity of John, joined to the State of preceding disorders of the French government, had pro-France. duced in that country, a dissolution, almost total, of civil authority, and had occasioned confusions, the most horrible and destructive that had ever been experienced in any age or in any nation. The dauphin, now about eighteen years of age, naturally assumed the royal power during his father's captivity; but though endowed with an excellent capacity, even in such early years, he possessed neither experience nor authority sufficient to defend a ¹ Froiffard, liv. i. chap. 173. m Rymer, vol. vi. p. 45, 46. 52. 56. Froiffard, liv. i. chap. 174. Walfing. p. 173.

C H A P. state, affailed at once by foreign power and shaken by intestine faction. In order to obtain supply, he assembled the states of the kingdom: That assembly, instead of sup-1358. porting his administration, were themselves seized with the spirit of confusion; and laid hold of the present opportunity to demand limitations of the prince's power, the punishment of past malversations, and the liberty of the king of Navarre. Marcel, provost of the merchants, and first magistrate of Paris, put himself at the head of the unruly populace; and from the violence and temerity of his character, pushed them to commit the most criminal outrages against the royal authority. They detained the dauphin in a fort of captivity; they murdered in his presence Robert de Clermont and John de Conflans, mareschals, the one of Normandy, the other of Burgundy; they threatened all the other ministers with a like fate; and when Charles, who was obliged to temporize and diffemble, made his escape from their hands, they levied war against him, and openly erected the standard of rebellion. The other cities of the kingdom, in imitation of the capital, shook off the dauphin's authority; took the government into their own hands; and spread the disorder into every province. The nobles, whose inclinations led them to adhere to the crown, and were naturally disposed to check these tumults, had loft all their influence; and being reproached with cowardice on account of the base desertion of their fovereign in the battle of Poictiers, were treated with universal contempt by the inferior orders. The troops, who, from the deficiency of pay, were no longer retained in discipline, threw off all regard to their officers, sought the means of subfissance by plunder and robbery, and affociating to them all the disorderly people, with whom that age abounded, formed numerous bands, which infested all parts of the kingdom. They desolated the open country; burned and plundered the villages;

and by cutting off all means of communication or fub-

fistance, reduced even the inhabitants of the walled C H A P. towns to the most extreme necessity. The peasants, formerly oppressed, and now left unprotected, by their masters, became desperate from their present misery; and rifing every where in arms, carried to the last extremity those disorders, which were derived from the sedition of the citizens and disbanded foldiers ". The gentry, hated for their tyranny, were every where exposed to the violence of popular rage; and instead of meeting with the regard due to their past dignity, became only, on that account, the object of more wanton infult to the mutinous peafants. They were hunted like wild beafts, and put to the fword without mercy: Their castles were confumed with fire, and levelled to the ground: Their wives and daughters were first ravished, then murdered: The favages proceeded fo far as to impale fome gentlemen, and roast them alive before a slow fire: A body of nine thoufand of them broke into Meaux, where the wife of the dauphin with above 300 ladies had taken shelter: The most brutal treatment and most atrocious cruelty were iustly dreaded by this helpless company: But the Captal de Buche, though in the service of Edward, yet moved by generofity and by the gallantry of a true knight, flew to their rescue, and beat off the peasants with great flaughter. In other civil wars, the opposite factions, falling under the government of their feveral leaders, commonly preserve still the vestige of some rule and order: But here the wild state of nature seemed to be renewed: Every man was thrown loofe and independant of his fellows: And the populoufness of the country, derived from the preceding police of civil fociety, ferved only to encrease the horror and confusion of the scene.

AMIDST these disorders, the king of Navarre made his escape from prison, and presented a dangerous leader to n Froisfard, liv. i. chap. 182, 183, 184.

464

1358.

CHAP. the furious malcontents. But the splendid talents of this prince qualified him only to do mischief, and to encrease the public diffractions: He wanted the steadiness and prudence requisite for making his intrigues subservient to his ambition, and forming his numerous partizans into a regular faction. He revived his pretentions, fomewhat obfolete, to the crown of France: But while he advanced this claim, he relied entirely on his alliance with the English, who were concerned in interest to disappoint his pretenfions, and who, being public and inveterate enemies to the state, served only, by the friendship which they feemingly bore him, to render his cause the more odious. And in all his operations, he acted more like a leader of banditti, than one who aspired to be the head of a regular government, and who was engaged by his station to endeavour the re-establishment of order in the community.

THE eyes, therefore, of all the French, who wished to restore peace to their miserable and desolated country, were turned towards the dauphin; and that young prince, though not remarkable for his military talents, poffeffed fo much prudence and spirit, that he daily gained the afcendant over all his enemies. Marcel, the feditious provost of Paris, was flain, while he was attempting to deliver the city to the king of Navarre and the English; and the capital immediately returned to its duty P. The most considerable bodies of the mutinous peasants were dispersed, and put to the sword: Some bands of military robbers underwent the fame fate: And though many grievous disorders still remained, France began gradually to assume the face of a regular civil government, and to form fome plan for its defence and fecurity.

DURING the confusion in the dauphin's affairs, Edward feemed to have a favourable opportunity for pushing his conquests: But besides that his hands were tied by C H A P. the truce, and he could only affift underhand the faction_ of Navarre; the state of the English finances and military power, during those ages, rendered the kingdom incapable of making any regular or fleady effort, and obliged it to exert its force at very distant intervals, by which all the projected ends were commonly disappointed. Edward employed himself, during a conjuncture so inviting, chiefly in negociations with his prifoner; and John had the weakness to fign terms of peace, which, had they taken effect, must have totally ruined and difmembered his kingdom. He agreed to restore all the provinces which had been possessed by Henry II. and his two fons, and to annex them for ever to England, without any obligation of homage or fealty on the part of the English monarch. But the dauphin and the states of France rejected this treaty, fo dishonourable and pernicious to the kingdom q; and Edward, on the expiration of the truce, having now, by fubfidies and frugality, collected some treasure, prepared himself for a new invasion of France.

THE great authority and renown of the king and the prince of Wales, the splendid success of their former enterprizes, and the certain prospect of plunder from the defenceless provinces of France, soon brought together the whole military power of England; and the fame motives invited to Edward's standard all the hardy adventurers of the different countries of Europe r. He passed over to Calais, where he affembled an army of near a hundred thousand men; a force which the dauphin could not pretend to withstand in the open field: That prince therefore prepared himfelf to elude a blow, which it was impossible for him to resist. He put all the considerable towns in a posture of defence; ordered them to be supplied,

9 Froiffard, liv. i. ch p. 201. Hh VOL. II.

I Ibide chape 205.

THE king, aware of this plan of defence, was obliged

C H A P. plied with magazines and provisions; distributed proper garrisons in all places; secured every thing valuable in the fortified cities; and chose his own station at Paris. 1358. with a view of allowing the enemy to vent their fury on the open country.

1359. ath Nov.

France.

$360.

to carry along with him fix thousand waggons, loaded with the provisions necessary for the subsistance of his army. After ravaging the province of Picardy, he advanced into Champagne; and having a strong desire of being crowned Invasion of king of France at Rheims, the usual place in which this ceremony is performed, he laid fiege to that city. and carried on his attacks, though without fuccess, for the space of seven weeks s. The place was bravely defended by the inhabitants, encouraged by the exhortations of the archbishop, John de Craon; till the advanced feason (for this expedition was entered upon in the beginning of winter) obliged the king to raife the fiege. The province of Champagne, meanwhile, was defolated by his incursions; and he thence conducted his army, with a like intent, into Burgundy. He took and pillaged Tonnerre, Gaillon, Avalon, and other small places; but the duke of Burgundy, that he might preserve his country from farther ravages, consented to pay him the fum of 100,000 nobles t. Edward then bent his march towards the Nivernois, which faved itself by a like composition: He laid waste Brie and the Gatinois; and after a long march, very destructive to France, and somewhat ruinous to his own troops, he appeared before the gates of Paris, and taking up his quarters at Bourg-la-Reine, extended his army to Long-jumeau, Mont-rouge, and Vaugirard. He tried to provoke the dauphin to hazard a battle, by fending him a defiance; but could not C H A P. make that prudent prince change his plan of operations. Paris was fafe from the danger of an affault by its numerous garrison; from that of a blockade by its well supplied magazines: And as Edward himself could not subfift his army in a country, wasted by foreign and domestic enemies, and left also empty by the precaution of the dauphin, he was obliged to remove his quarters; and he spread his troops into the provinces of Maine, Beausse, and the Chartraine, which were abandoned to the fury of their devastations ". The only repose, which France experienced, was during the festival of Easter, when the king stopped the course of his ravages. For superstition can fometimes restrain the rage of men, which neither justice nor humanity is able to controul.

^{*} Froiffard, liv. i. chap. 208. Walfing. p. 174. t Rymer, vol. vi. p. 161. Walfing. p. 174.

1360

WHILE the war was carried on in this ruinous manner. the negociations for peace were never interrupted: But as the king still infisted on the full execution of the treaty. which he had made with his prisoner at London, and which was strenuously rejected by the dauphin, there appeared no likelihood of an accommodation. The earl, now dake of Lancaster (for this title was introduced into England during the present reign), endeavoured to soften the rigour of these terms, and to finish the war on more equal and reasonable conditions. He insisted with Edward, that, notwithstanding his great and surprising succeffes, the object of the war, if fuch were to be efteemed the acquisition of the crown of France, was not become any nearer than at the commencement of it; or rather, was fet at a greater distance, by those very victories and advantages, which feemed to lead to it. That his claim of fuccession had not from the first procured him one partizan in the kingdom; and the continuance of these deftructive hostilities had united every Frenchman in the > n Walfing. p. 175. Hh2

CHAP. most implacable animosity against him. That though intestine faction had creeped into the government of France, it was abating every moment; and no party, even during the greatest heat of the contest, when subjection under a foreign enemy usually appears preferable to the dominion of fellow-citizens, had ever adopted the pretenfions of the king of England. That the king of Navarre himself, who alone was allied with the English, instead of being a cordial friend, was Edward's most dangerous rival, and in the opinion of his partizans possessed a much preferable title to the crown of France. That the prolongation of the war, however it might enrich the English soldiers, was ruinous to the king himself, who bore all the charges of the armament, without reaping any folid or durable advantage from it. That if the present disorders of France continued, that kingdom would foon be reduced to fuch a state of defolation that it would afford no spoils to its ravagers; if it could establish a more steady government, it might turn the chance of war in its favour, and by its superior force and advantages, be able to repel the present victors. the dauphin, even during his greatest distresses, had yet conducted himself with so much prudence as to prevent the English from acquiring one foot of land in the kingdom; and it were better for the king to accept by a peace what he had in vain attempted to acquire by hostilities, which, however hitherto successful, had been extremely expensive, and might prove very danger-And that Edward having acquired fo much glory by his arms, the praise of moderation was the only honour, to which he could now aspire; an honour so much the greater, as it was durable, was united with that of prudence, and might be attended with the most real advantages w.

THESE reasons induced Edward to accept of more C H A P. moderate terms of peace; and it is probable, that, in order to palliate this change of resolution, he ascribed it peace of to a vow made during a dreadful tempest, which at-Bretigni. tacked his army on their march, and which ancient historians represent as the cause of this sudden accommodation *. The conferences between the English and French commissioners were carried on during a few days at Bre-8th May. tigni in the Chartraine, and the peace was at last concluded on the following conditions y: It was stipulated that king John should be restored to his liberty, and should pay as his ransom three millions of crowns of gold, about 1,500,000 pounds of our prefent money 2; which was to be discharged at different payments: That Edward should for ever renounce all claim to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, Touraine, and Anjou, possessed by his ancestors; and should receive in exchange the provinces of Poictou, Xaintonge, l'Agenois, Perigort, the Limoufin, Quercy, Rovergue, l'Angoumois, and other districts in that quarter, together with Calais, Guifnes, Montreuil, and the county of Ponthieu, on the other fide of France: That the full fovereignty of all these provinces, as well as that of Guienne, should be vested in the crown of England, and that France should renounce all title to feudal jurisdiction, homage, or appeal from them: That the king of Navarre should be restored to all his honours and possessions: That Edward should renounce his confederacy with the Flemings, John his connexions with the Scots: That the disputes concerning the succession of Britanny, between the families of Blois and Mountfort, should be decided by arbiters, appointed by the two kings; and if the competitors refused to submit to the award, [×] Froiffard, liv. 1. chap. 211.

Froiffard, liv. i. chap. 212.

Froiffard, liv. i. chap. 212.

Hh 3

TRymer, vol. vi. p. 178.

The specific of the volume.

the kingdoms: And that forty hostages, such as should be agreed on, should be fent to England as a security for the execution of all these conditions.

8th July.

In consequence of this treaty, the king of France was brought over to Calais; whither Edward also soon after repaired: And there, both princes folemnly ratified the treaty. John was fent to Boulogne; the king accompanied him a mile on his journey; and the two monarchs parted, with many professions, probably cordial and fincere, of mutual amity b. The good disposition of John made him fully fenfible of the generous treatment which he had received in England, and obliterated all memory of the afcendant gained over him by his rival. There feldom has been a treaty of fo great importance fo faithfully executed by both parties. Edward had fearcely from the beginning entertained any hopes of acquiring the crown of France: By restoring John to his liberty, and making peace at a juncture fo favourable to his arms, he had now plainly renounced all pretentions of this nature: He had fold at a very high price that chimerical claim: And had at prefent no other interest than to retain those acquisitions which he had made with such fingular prudence and good fortune. John, on the other hand, though the terms were fevere, possessed fuch fidelity and honour, that he was determined at all hazards to execute them, and to use every expedient for satisfying a mob Froiffard, liv. i. chap. 213.

a The hostages were the two sons of the French king, John and Lewis; his brother Philip duke of Orleans, the duke of Bourbon, James de Bourbon count de Ponthieu, the counts d'Eu, de Longueville, de St. Pol, de Harcourt, de Vendome, de Couci, de Craon, de Montmorenci, and many of the chief nobility of France. The princes were mostly released on the fulfilling of certain articles: Others of the hostages, and the duke of Berry among the rest, were permitted to return upon their parole, which they did not keep. Rymer, vol. vi. p. 278. 285. 287.

narch, who had indeed been his greatest political enemy, C H A P. but had treated him personally with singular humanity and regard. But, notwithstanding his endeavours, there occurred many difficulties in fulfilling his purpose; chiefly from the extreme reluctance, which many towns and vaffals in the neighbourhood of Guienne, expressed against submitting to the English dominion c; and John, in order to adjust these differences, took a resolution of coming over himfelf to England. His council endeavoured to diffuade him from this rash design; and probably would have been pleased to see him employ more chicanes for eluding the execution of fo disadvantageous a treaty: But John replied to them, that, though good faith were banished from the rest of the earth, she ought still to retain her habitation in the breafts of princes. Some historians would detract from the merit of this honourable conduct, by reprefenting John as enamoured of an English lady, to whom he was glad, on this pretence, to pay a vifit: But befides, that this furmife is not founded on any good authority, it appears fomewhat unlikely on account of the advanced age of that prince, who was now in his fiftyfixth, year. He was lodged in the Savoy; the palace where he had refided during his captivity, and where he foon after fickened and died. Nothing can be a ftronger 8th April. proof of the great dominion of fortune over men, than the calamities which purfued a monarch of fuch eminent valour, goodness, and honour, and which he incurred merely by reason of some slight imprudences, which, in other fituations, would have been of no importance. But though both his reign and that of his father proved extremely unfortunate to their kingdom, the French crown acquired, during their time, very confiderable accessions, those of Dauphiny and Burgundy. This latter province, however, John had the imprudence again to difmember

1363.

1360.

1364.

his most tender affections f; a deed, which was afterwards
the source of many calamities to the kingdom.

TOHN was fucceeded in the throne by Charles, the Dauphin, a prince educated in the school of adversity, and well qualified, by his confummate prudence and experience, to repair all the losses, which the kingdom had fustained from the errors of his two predecessors. Contrary to the practice of all the great princes of those times, which held nothing in estimation but military courage, he feems to have fixed it as a maxim never to appear at the head of his armies; and he was the first king in Europe, that showed the advantage of policy, forefight, and judgment, above a rash and precipitate valour. events of his reign, compared with those of the preceding, are a proof, how little reason kingdoms have to value themselves on their victories, or to be humbled by their defeats; which in reality ought to be ascribed chiefly to the good or bad conduct of their rulers, and are of little moment towards determining national characters and manners.

State of France.

BEFORE Charles could think of counterbalancing for great a power as England, it was necessary for him to remedy the many disorders, to which his own kingdom was exposed. He turned his arms against the king of Navarre, the great disturber of France during that age: He defeated this prince by the conduct of Bertrand du Guefelin, a gentleman of Britanny, one of the most accomplished characters of the age, whom he had the discernment to chuse as the instrument of all his victories s; And he obliged his enemy to accept of moderate terms of peace. Du Gueselin was less fortunate in the wars of Britanny, which still continued, notwithstanding the me-

f Rymer, vol, vi. p. 421,

g Froisfard, liv. g. chap. 119,

diation of France and England: He was defeated and C H A P. taken prisoner at Auray by Chandos: Charles of Blois was there flain, and the young count of Mountfort foon after got entire possession of that dutchy h. But the prudence of Charles broke the force of this blow: He submitted to the decision of fortune: He acknowledged the title of Mountfort, though a zealous partizan of England; and received the proffered homage for his dominions. But the chief obstacle which the French king met with in the fettlement of the state, proceeded from obscure enemies, whom their crimes alone rendered eminent, and their number dangerous.

On the conclusion of the treaty of Bretigni, the many military adventurers, who had followed the standard of Edward, being disperfed into the feveral provinces, and possessed of strong holds, refused to lay down their arms, or relinquish a course of life, to which they were now accustomed, and by which alone they could gain a subfistance i. They affociated themselves with the banditti, who were already enured to the habits of rapine and violence; and under the name of the companies and companions, became a terror to all the peaceable inhabitants. Some English and Gascon gentlemen of character, particularly Sir Matthew Gournay, Sir Hugh Calverly, the chevalier Verte, and others, were not ashamed to take the command of these rushians, whose numbers amounted on the whole to near 40,000, and who bore the appearance of regular armies, rather than bands of robbers. These leaders fought pitched battles with the troops of France, and gained victories; in one of which Jaques de Bourbon, a prince of the blood, was flain k: And they proceeded to fuch a height, that they wanted little but regular establishments to become princes, and thereby fanctify, by the maxims of h Froistard, liv. 1. chap. 227, 228, &c. Walfing. p. 180. k Ibid, chap. 214, 2150 Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 214, they committed on the country, the more easy they found it to recruit their number: All those, who were reduced to misery and despair, slocked to their standard: The evil was every day encreasing: And though the pope declared them excommunicated, these military plunderers, however deeply affected with the sentence, to which they paid a much greater regard than to any principles of morality, could not be induced by it to betake themselves to peaceable or lawful professions.

Mas Charles was not able by power to redress so enormous a grievance, he was led by necessity, and by the turn of his character, to correct it by policy, and to contrive some method of discharging into foreign countries this dangerous and intestine evil.

PETER, king of Castile, stigmatized by his contemporaries and by posterity, with the epithet of Cruel, had filled with blood and murder his kingdom and his own family; and having incurred the universal hatred of his subjects, he kept, from present terror alone, an anxious and precarious possession of the throne. His nobles fell every day the victims of his feverity: He put to death feveral of his natural brothers from groundless jealoufy: Each murder, by multiplying his enemies, became the occasion of fresh barbarities: And as he was not destitute of talents, his neighbours, no less than his own subjects, were alarmed at the progress of his violence and injustice. The ferocity of his temper, instead of being fostened by his strong propensity to love, was rather inslamed by that paffion, and took thence new occasion to exert itself. Instigated by Mary de Padilla, who had acquired the ascendant over him, he threw into prison Blanche de Bourbon, his wife, fister to the queen of France; and foon after made way by poifon for the espousing of his mistress.

HENRY, count of Transfamare, his natural brother, CHAP. feeing the fate of every one who had become obnoxious to this tyrant, took arms against him; but being foiled 1366. in the attempt, he fought for refuge in France, where he found the minds of men extremely inflamed against Peter, on account of his murder of the French princess. He asked permission of Charles to enlist the companies in his fervice, and to lead them into Castile; where, from the concurrence of his own friends and the enemies of his brother, he had the prospect of certain and immediate fuccess. The French king, charmed with the project, employed du Guesclin in negociating with the leaders of these banditti. The treaty was soon concluded. The high character of honour, which that general possessed, made every one trust to his promises: Though the intended expedition was kept a fecret, the companies implicitly inlifted under his flandard: And they required no other condition before their engagement, than an affurance, that they were not to be led against the prince of Wales in Guienne. But that prince was fo little averse to the enterprize, that he allowed fome gentlemen of his retinue to enter into the service under du Guesclin.

Du Gueschin, having completed his levies, led the army first to Avignon, where the pope then resided, and demanded, fword in hand, an absolution for his soldiers, and the fum of 200,000 livres. The first was readily promised him; some more difficulty was made with regard to the fecond. " I believe, that my fellows," replied du Guesclin, " may make a shift to do without of your absolution; but the money is absolutely necessa-" ry." The pope then extorted from the inhabitants in the city and neighbourhood the fum of a hundred thoufand livres, and offered it to du Guesclin. "It is not my " purpose," cried that generous warrior, " to oppress the 66 innocent people. The pope and his cardinals themselves 66 can CHAP. a can well spare me that sum from their own coffers. This money, I infift, must be restored to the owners. 46 And should they be defrauded of it, I shall myself re-1366. turn from the other side of the Pyrenees, and oblige you to make them restitution." The pope found the necessity of submitting, and paid him, from his treasury, the fum demanded !. The army, hallowed by the bleffings, and enriched by the spoils of the church, proceeded on their expedition.

THESE experienced and hardy foldiers, conducted by so able a general, easily prevailed over the king of Castile, whose subjects, instead of supporting their oppressor, were ready to join the enemy against him m. Peter fled from his dominions, took shelter in Guienne, and craved the protection of the prince of Wales, whom his father had invefted with the fovereignty of these conquered prowinces, by the title of the principality of Aquitaine". The prince feemed now to have entirely changed his fentiments with regard to the Spanish transactions: Whether that he was moved by the generofity of supporting a diftreffed prince, and thought, as is but too usual among fovereigns, that the rights of the people were a matter of much less consideration; or dreaded the acquisition of so powerful a confederate to France as the new king of Caftile: or what is most probable, was impatient of rest and eafe, and fought only an opportunity for exerting his military talents, by which he had already acquired fo much renown. He promised his assistance to the dethroned monarch; and having obtained the confent of his father, into Cafille. he levied a great army, and fet out upon his enterprize. He was accompanied by his younger brother, John of Gaunt, created duke of Lancaster, in the room of the good prince of that name, who had died without any male

Expedition

m Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 230. Hift. du Guesclin. Rymer, vol. vi. p. 384. Froisfard, iv. 1. chap. 231.

iffue,

Mue, and whose daughter he had espoused. Chandos characher, also, who bere among the English the same characher, which du Guesclin had acquired among the French, commanded under him in this expedition.

THE first blow, which the prince of Wales gave to Henry of Transtamare, was the recalling of all the companies from his service; and so much reverence did they bear to the name of Edward, that great numbers of them immediately withdrew from Spain, and inlifted under his banners. Henry however, beloved by his new subjects, and supported by the king of Arragon and others of his neighbours, was able to meet the enemy with an army of 100,000 men; forces three times more numerous than those which were commanded by Edward. Du Guesclim, and all his experienced officers, advised him to delay any decifive action, to cut off the prince of Wales's provifions, and to avoid every engagement with a general, whose enterprizes had hitherto been always conducted with prudence, and crowned with fuccess. Henry trusted too much to his numbers; and ventured to encounter the English prince at Najara . Historians of that age are 3d April. commonly very copious in describing the shock of armies in battle, the valour of the combatants, the flaughter and various fuccesses of the day: But though small rencounters in those times were often well disputed, military discipline was always too imperfect to preserve order in great armies; and fuch actions deferve more the name of routs than of battles. Henry was chaced off the field, with the loss of above 20,000 men: There perished only four knights and forty private men on the fide of the English.

PETER, who so well merited the infamous epithet which he bore, purposed to murder all his prisoners in cool blood; but was restrained from this barbarity by the

478

fubmitted to the victor: Peter was restored to the throne:

And Edward sinished this perilous enterprize with his usual glory. But he had soon reason to repent his connexions with a man like Peter, abandoned to all sense of virtue and honour. The ungrateful tyrant resused the shipulated pay to the English forces; and Edward, sinding his soldiers daily perish by sickness, and even his own health impaired by the climate, was obliged, without receiving any satisfaction on this head, to return into Guienne?

The barbarities, exercifed by Peter over his helpless subjects, whom he now regarded as vanquished rebels, revived all the animosity of the Castilians against him; and on the return of Henry of Transfamare, together with du Guesclin, and some forces levied anew in France, the tyrant was again dethroned, and was taken prisoner. His brother, in resentment of his cruelties, murdered him with his own hand; and was placed on the throne of Castile, which he transmitted to his posterity. The duke of Lancaster, who espoused in second marriage the eldest daughter of Peter, inherited only the empty title of that sovereignty, and, by claiming the succession, encreased the animosity of the new king of Castile against England.

$368. Rupture with France. But the prejudice, which the affairs of prince Edward received from this splendid, though imprudent expedition, ended not with it. He had involved himself in so much debt by his preparations and the pay of his troops, that he found it necessary, on his return, to impose on his principality a new tax, to which some of the nobility consented with extreme reluctance, and to which others absolutely refused to submit q. This incident C H A P. tevived the animofity which the inhabitants bore to the English, and which all the amiable qualities of the prince of Wales were not able to mitigate or affuage. They complained, that they were confidered as a conquered people, that their privileges were difregarded, that all trust was given to the English alone, that every office of honour and profit was conferred on these foreigners, and that the extreme reluctance, which most of them had expressed, to receive the new yoke, was likely to be long remembered against them. They cast, therefore, their eyes towards their ancient fovereign, whose prudence, they found, had now brought the affairs of his kingdom into excellent order; and the counts of Armagnac, Comminge, and Perigord, the Lord d'Albret, with other nobles, went to Paris, and were encouraged to carry their complaints to Charles, as to their lord paramount, against these oppressions of the English government r.

In the treaty of Bretigni it had been stipulated, that the two kings should make renunciations; Edward of his claim to the crown of France and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, and Anjou; John of the homage and fealty due for Guienne and the other provinces ceded to the English. But when that treaty was confirmed and renewed at Calais, it was found necessary, as Edward was not yet in possession of all the territories, that the mutual renunciations should for some time be deferred;

⁹ This tax was a livre upon a hearth; and it was imagined, that the imposition would have yielded 1,200,000 livres a year, which supposes so many heartles in the provinces possessed by the English. But such loose conjectures have commonly no manner of authority, much less in such ignorant times. There is a strong instance of it in the present reign. The house of commons granted the king a tax of twenty-two shillings on each parish, supposing that the amount of the whole would be 50,000 pounds. But they were found to be in a mistake of near five to one. Cotton, p. 3. And the council assumed the power of augmenting the tax upon each parish.

r Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 244.

Though the failure in exchanging these renunciations had still proceeded from France, Edward appears to have taken no umbrage at it; both because this clause seemed to give him entire security, and because some reasonable apology had probably been made to him for each delay. It was, however, on this pretence, though directly contrary to treaty, that Charles resolved to ground his claim, of still considering himself as superior lord of those provinces, and of receiving the appeals of his sub-vassals.

1369.

BUT as views of policy, more than those of justice, enter into the deliberations of princes; and as the mortal injuries received from the English, the pride of their triumphs, the fevere terms imposed by the treaty of peace, feemed to render every prudent means of revenge honourable against them; Charles was determined to take this measure, less by the reasonings of his civilians and lawvers, than by the present situation of the two monarchies. He confidered the declining years of Edward, the languishing state of the prince of Wales's health, the affection which the inhabitants of all these provinces bore to their ancient master, their distance from England, their vicinity to France, the extreme animofity expressed by his own subjects against these invaders, and their ardent thirst of vengeance; and having filently made all the necessary preparations, he sent to the prince of Wales a fummons to appear in his court at Paris, and there to justify his conduct towards his vassals. The prince replied, that he would come to Paris; but it should be at the head of fixty thousand men w. The unwarlike cha-

Rot. Franc. u Froissard, liv. 1.

OF

⁸ Rymer, vol. vi. p. 219. 230. 234 237. 243. 35 Edw. III. m. 3. from Tyrrel, vol. iii. p. 643. chap. 245. W Ibid, chap. 247, 248.

racter of Charles kept prince Edward, even yet, from C H A P. thinking, that that monarch was in earnest, in this bold and hazardous attempt.

IT foon appeared what a poor return the king had received by his diffant conquests for all the blood and treafure expended in the quarrel, and how impossible it was to retain acquifitions, in an age when no regular force could be maintained fufficient to defend them against the revolt of the inhabitants, especially if that danger was joined with the invasion of a foreign enemy. Charles fell first upon Ponthieu, which gave the English an inlet Ill success of into the heart of France: The citizens of Abbeville opened their gates to him *: Those of St. Valori, Rue, and Crotoy imitated the example, and the whole country was in a little time reduced to fubmission. The dukes of Berri and Anjou, brothers to Charles, being affifted by du Guesclin, who was recalled from Spain, invaded the fouthern provinces; and by means of their good conduct, the favourable dispositions of the people, and the ardour of the French nobility, they made every day confiderable progress against the English. The state of the prince of Wales's health did not permit him to mount on horseback, or exert his usual activity: Chandos, the constable of Guienne, was slain in one action y: The Captal de Buche, who fucceeded him in that office, was taken prifoner in another 2: And when young Edward himself was obliged by his encreasing infirmities to throw up the command, and return to his native country, the affairs of the English in the south of France seemed to be menaced with total ruin.

THE king, incensed at these injuries, threatened to put to death all the French hostages, who remained in his hands; but on resection abstained from that ungenerous revenge. After resuming, by advice of parliament, the x Walfingham, p. 183. y Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 277. Walfingham, p. 185. x Froisfard, liv. 1. chap. 310.

VOL. II.

Ti

vain

C H A P. vain title of king of France a, he endeavoured to fend fuccours into Gascony; but all his attempts, both by sea 1370. and land, proved unsuccessful. The earl of Pembroke was intercepted at fea, and taken prisoner with his whole army near Rochelle by a fleet, which the king of Castile had fitted out for that purpose b: Edward himself embarked for Bourdeaux with another army; but was fo long detained by contrary winds, that he was obliged to lay afide the enterprize c. Sir Robert Knolles, at the head of 30,000 men, marched out of Calais, and continued his ravages to the gates of Paris, without being able to provoke the enemy to an engagement: He proceeded in his march to the provinces of Maine and Anjou, which he laid waste; but part of his army being there defeated by the conduct of du Guesclin, who was now created constable of France, and who feems to have been the first consummate general that had yet appeared in Europe, the rest were scattered and dispersed, and the small remains of the English forces, instead of reaching Guienne, took shelter in Britanny, whose sovereign had embraced the alliance of England d. The duke of Lancaster, some time after, made a like attempt with an army of 25,000 men; and marched the whole length of France from Calais to Bourdeaux; but was fo much haraffed by the flying parties which attended him, that he brought not the half of his army to the place of their deffination. Edward, from the necessity of his affairs, was at last obliged to conclude a truce with the enemy e; after almost all his ancient possessions in France had been ravished from him, except Bourdeaux and Bayonne, and all his conquests, except Calais.

a Rymer, vol. vi. p. 621. Cotton's Abridg. p. 108. Froiffard, fiv. 1. chap. 302, 303, 304. Walfingham, p. 186. Froiffard, liv. 1. chap. 311. Walfingham, p. 187. d Froiffard, liv. 1. chap. 291. Walfingham, p. 185. Froiffard, liv. 1. chap. 311. Walfingham, p. 187.

THE decline of the king's life was exposed to many C H A P. mortifications, and corresponded not to the splendid and noify scenes, which had filled the beginning and the middle of it. Besides seeing the loss of his foreign dominions, and being baffled in every attempt to defend them: he felt the decay of his authority at home, and experienced, from the sharpness of some parliamentary remonftrances, the great inconftancy of the people, and the influence of present fortune over all their judgments f. This prince, who, during the vigour of his age, had been chiefly occupied in the pursuits of war and ambition, began, at an unfeafonable period, to indulge himfelf in pleafure; and being now a widower, he attached himself to a lady of sense and spirit, one Alice Pierce, who acquired a great ascendant over him, and by her influence gave fuch general difgust, that, in order to satisfy the parliament, he was obliged to remove her from court s, The indolence alfo, naturally attending old age and infirmities, had made him, in a great measure, refign the administration into the hands of his fon, the duke of Lancaster, who, as he was far from being popular, weakened extremely the affection, which the English bore to the person and government of the king. Men carried their jealousies very far against the duke; and as they saw with much regret, the death of the prince of Wales every day approaching, they apprehended, left the fuccession of his fon, Richard, now a minor, should be defeated by the intrigues of Lancaster, and by the weak indulgence of the old king. But Edward, in order to fatisfy both the people and the prince on this head, declared in parliament his grandfon heir and fucceffor to the crown; and thereby cut off all the hopes of the duke of Lancaster, if he ever had the temerity to entertain any.

f Walfingham, p. 189. Ypod. Neuft. p. 5300

Z Walfingham, p. 189.

CHAP. XVI. 1376. 8th June. Death of the prince of Wales.

THE prince of Wales, after a lingering illness, died in the forty-fixth year of his age; and left a character, illustrious for every eminent virtue, and from his earliest youth till the hour he expired, unstained by any blemish. His valour and military talents formed the fmallest part of his merit: His generofity, humanity, affability, moderation, gained him the affections of all men; and he was qualified to throw a luftre, not only on that rude age, in which he lived, and which nowise infected him with its vices, but on the most shining period of ancient or modern history. The king furvived about a year this melancholy incident: England was deprived at once of both these princes, its chief ornament and support: He expired in the fixty-fifth year of his age and the fifty-first of his reign; and the people were then fenfible, though too late, of the irreparable lofs, which they had fuftained.

1377. 21st June. Death

and character of the king.

THE English are apt to consider with peculiar fondness the history of Edward III. and to esteem his reign, as it was one of the longest, the most glorious also, that occurs in the annals of their nation. The afcendant which they then began to acquire over France, their rival and fupposed national enemy, makes them cast their eyes on this period with great complacency, and fanctifies every measure, which Edward embraced for that end. But the domestic government of this prince is really more admirable than his foreign victories; and England enjoyed, by the prudence and vigour of his administration, a longer interval of domestic peace and tranquillity than she had been bleft with in any former period, or than the experienced for many ages after. He gained the affections of the great, yet curbed their licentiousness: He made them feel his power, without their daring, or even being inclined, to murmur at it: His affable and obliging behaviour, his munificence and generofity, made them fubmit with pleasure to his dominion; his valour and conduct made them successful in most of their enterprizes; and C H A P. their unquiet spirits, directed against a public enemy, had no leifure to breed those disturbances, to which they were naturally fo much inclined, and which the frame of the government feemed fo much to authorize. This was the chief benefit, which refulted from Edward's victories and conquests. His foreign wars were, in other respects, neither founded in justice, nor directed to any falutary purpose. His attempt against the king of Scotland, a minor and a brother-in-law, and the revival of his grandfather's claim of superiority over that kingdom, were both unreasonable and ungenerous; and he allowed himself to be too eafily feduced, by the glaring prospect of French conquests, from the acquisition of a point, which was practicable, and which, if attained, might really have been of lasting utility to his country and his successors. The fuccess, which he met with in France, though chiefly owing to his eminent talents, was unexpected; and yet, from the very nature of things, not from any unforeseen accidents, was found, even during his life-time, to have procured him no folid advantages. But the glory of a conqueror is fo dazzling to the vulgar, the animofity of nations is fo violent, that the fruitless desolation of so fine a part of Europe as France, is totally difregarded by us, and is never confidered as a blemish in the character or conduct of this prince. And indeed, from the unfortunate state of human nature, it will commonly happen, that a fovereign of genius, fuch as Edward, who usually finds every thing eafy in his domestic government, will turn himself towards military enterprizes, where alone he meets with opposition, and where he has full exercise for his industry and capacity.

EDWARD had a numerous posterity by his queen, Philippa of Hainault. His eldest son was the heroic Edward, usually denominated the Black Prince, from the colour of his armour. This prince espoused his cousin Joan, commonly

Ii 3

of his uncle, the earl of Kent, who was beheaded in the beginning of this reign. She was first married to Sir Thomas Holland, by whom she had children. By the prince of Wales, she had a son, Richard, who alone survived his father.

THE fecond fon of king Edward (for we pass over such as died in their childhood) was Lionel duke of Clarence, who was first married to Elizabeth de Burgh, daughter and heir of the earl of Ulster, by whom he left only one daughter, married to Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche. Lionel espoused in second marriage, Violante, the daughter of the duke of Milan h, and died in Italy soon after the consummation of his nuptials, without leaving any posterity by that princess. Of all the family, he resembled most his father and elder brother in his noble qualities.

EDWARD's third fon was John of Gaunt, so called from the place of his birth: He was created duke of Lancaster; and from him sprang that branch which afterwards possessed the crown. The fourth son of this royal family was Edmund, created earl of Cambridge by his father, and duke of York by his nephew. The fifth son was Thomas, who received the title of earl of Buckingham from his father, and that of duke of Glocester from his nephew. In order to prevent confusion, we shall always distinguish these two princes by the titles of York and Glocester, even before they were advanced to them.

THERE were also several princesses born to Edward by Philippa; to wit, Isabella, Joan, Mary, and Margaret, who espoused, in the order of their names, Ingelram de Coucy earl of Bedford, Alphonso king of Castile, John of Mountfort duke of Britanny, and John Hastings earl of Pembroke. The princess Joan died at Bourdeaux before the confummation of her marriage.

Miscellane- IT is remarked by an elegant historian i, that Conquercustians of this ors, though usually the bane of human kind, proved ict. A. Rymer, vol. vi. p. 564.

i Dr. Robertson's Hift of Scotland, B. r.

often in those feudal times, the most indulgent of sove- C H A P. reigns: They stood most in need of supplies from their people; and not being able to compel them by force to fubmit to the necessary impositions, they were obliged to make them fome compensation, by equitable laws and popular concessions. This remark is, in some measure, though imperfectly, justified by the conduct of Edward III. He took no steps of moment without consulting his parliament, and obtaining their approbation, which he afterwards pleaded as a reason for their supporting his measures i. The parliament, therefore, rose into greater confideration during his reign, and acquired more regularauthority than in any former time; and even the house of commons, which, during turbulent and factious periods, was naturally depressed by the greater power of the crown and barons, began to appear of some weight in the conftitution. In the later years of Edward, the king's minifters were impeached in parliament, particularly lord Latimer, who fell a facrifice to the authority of the commons k; and they even obliged the king to banish his mistress by their remonstrances. Some attention was also paid to the election of their members; and lawyers, in particular, who were, at that time, men of a character fomewhat inferior, were totally excluded the house during feveral parliaments 1.

ONE of the most popular laws, enacted by any prince, was the statute, which passed in the twenty-fifth of this reign m, and which limited the cases of high treason, before vague and uncertain, to three principal heads, confpiring the death of the king, levying war against him, and adhering to his enemies; and the judges were prohibited, if any other cases should occur, from inslicting the penalty of treason, without an application to parliament. The bounds of treason were indeed so much k Ibil. p. 122. 1 Cotton's Abridg. p. 108. 120.

l Cotton's Abridg. p. 18. m Chap. 2.

out any alteration, that the lawyers were obliged to enlarge them, and to explain a confpiracy for levying war against the king to be equivalent to a conspiracy against his life; and this interpretation, seemingly forced, has,
from the necessity of the case, been tacitly acquiesced in.
It was also ordained, that a parliament should be held once a year or oftener, if need be: A law which, like many others, was never observed, and lost its authority by disuse.

EDWARD granted above twenty parliamentary confirmations of the Great Charter; and these concessions are commonly appealed to as proofs of his great indulgence to the people, and his tender regard for their liberties. But the contrary prefumption is more natural. If the maxims of Edward's reign had not been in general fomewhat arbitrary, and if the Great Charter had not been frequently violated, the parliament would never have applied for these frequent confirmations, which could add no force to a deed regularly observed, and which could ferve to no other purpose, than to prevent the contrary precedents from turning into a rule, and acquiring authority. It was indeed the effect of the irregular government during those ages, that a flatute, which had been enacted some years, instead of acquiring, was imagined to lose force, by time, and needed to be often renewed by recent statutes of the same sense and tenor. Hence likewise that general clause, so frequent in old acts of parliament, that the flatutes, enacted by the king's progenitors, should be observed o; a precaution, which, if we do not confider the circumstances of the times, might appear abfurd and ridiculous. The frequent confirmations in general terms of the privileges of the church proceeded from the same cause.

n 4 Edw. III. chap. 14.

o 36 Edw. III. cap. 1. 37 Edw. III.

1377-

IT is a clause in one of Edward's statutes, that no C H A P man, of what estate or condition soever, shall be put out of land or tenement, nor taken nor imprisoned, nor disperited, nor put to death, without being brought in answer by due process of the law P. This privilege was sufficiently secured by a clause of the Great Charter, which had received a general confirmation in the first chapter of the same statute. Why then is the clause so anxiously, and, as we may think, fo superfluously repeated? Plainly, because there had been fome late infringements of it, which gave umbrage to the commons 4.

Bur there is no article, in which the laws are more frequently repeated during this reign, almost in the same terms, than that of purveyance, which the parliament always calls an outrageous and intolerable grievance, and the fource of infinite damage to the people . The parliament tried to abolish this prerogative altogether, by prohibiting any one from taking goods without the confent of the owners , and by changing the heinous name of purveyors, as they term it, into that of buyers : But the arbitrary conduct of Edward still brought back the grievance upon them; though contrary both to the Great Charter, and to many ftatutes. This diforder was in a great measure derived from the state of the public finances and of the kingdom; and could therefore the less admit of remedy. The prince frequently wanted ready money; yet his family must be subsisted: He was therefore obliged to employ force and violence for that purpose, and to give tallies, at what rate he pleased, to the owners of the goods which he laid hold of. The kingdom also abounded so little in commodities, and the interior communication was so imperfect, that, had the owners been strictly protected

P 28 Edw. III. cap. 3. q They affert, in the 15th of this reign. that there had been such instances. Cotton's Abridg. p. 31. They repeat the same in the aift year. See p. 39. 1 36 Edw. III. &c. s 14 Edw. III. cap. 19. t 36 Edw. III. cap. 2. by king; especially in his frequent progresses, when he came to distant and poor places, where the court did not usually reside, and where a regular plan for supplying it could not easily be established. Not only the king, but several great lords, insisted upon this right of purveyance within certain districts.

THE magnificent castle of Windsor was built by Edward III. and his method of conducting the work may serve as a specimen of the condition of the people in that age. Instead of engaging workmen by contracts and wages, he assessed every county in England to send him a certain number of masons, tilers, and carpenters, as if he had been levying an army w.

They mistake, indeed, very much the genius of this reign, who imagine that it was not extremely arbitrary. All the high prerogatives of the crown were to the full exerted in it; but what gave fome confolation, and promised in time some relief to the people, they were always complained of by the commons: Such as the dispensing power x; the extension of the forests y; erecting monopolies 2; exacting loans 2; stopping justice by particular warrants b; the renewal of the commission of trailbaton c; pressing men and ships into the public service a; levying arbitrary and exorbitant fines e; extending the authority of the privy council or star-chamber to the decision of private causes f; enlarging the power of the mareschal's and other arbitrary courts 5; imprisoning members for freedom of speech in parliament h; obliging people without any rule to fend recruits of men at arms, archers, and hoblers to the army i.

ei

1377°

Bur there was no act of arbitrary power more frequent- C H & P. ly repeated in this reign, than that of impoling taxes without confent of parliament. Though that affembly granted the king greater supplies than had ever been obtained by any of his predecessors, his great undertakings and the necessity of his affairs obliged him to levy still more; and after his splendid success against France had added weight to his authority, these arbitrary impositions became almost annual and perpetual. Cotton's Abridgment of the records affords numerous instances of this kind, in the first 'year of his reign, in the thirteenth year k, in the fourteenth 1, in the twentieth m, in the twenty-first n, in the twenty-fecond o, in the twenty-fifth p, in the thirtyeighth q, in the fiftieth , and in the fifty-first s.

The king openly avowed and maintained this power of levying taxes at pleasure. At one time, he replied to the remonstrance made by the commons against it, that the impositions had been exacted from great necessity, and had been affented to by the prelates, earls, barons, and fome of the commons t; at another, that he would advise with his council u. When the parliament defired, that a law might be enacted for the punishment of such as levied these arbitrary impositions, he refused compliance w. In the fubfequent year, they defired that the king might renounce this pretended prerogative; but his answer was, that he would levy no taxes without necesfity, for the defence of the realm, and where he reasonably might use that authority x. This incident passed a few days before his death; and these were, in a manner, his last words to his people. It would feem, that the famous charter or statute of Edward I. de tallagio non concedendo.

¹ Rymer, vol. k P. 17, 18. i Rymer, vol. iv. p. 363. o P. 69. m P. 47. n P. 52, 53. 57, 58. iv. p. 39. r P. 138. 9 P. 101.

t Cotton, p. 53. He repeats the same answer in p. 60. Some of the comu Cottons mons were fuch as he should be pleased to consult with.

P. 57. w Ibid. p. 138. x Ibid. p. 132.

KYL. already lost by age all its authority.

3377·

These facts can only flow the practice of the times: For as to the right, the continual remonstrances of the commons may seem to prove that it rather lay on their side: At least, these remonstrances served to prevent the arbitrary practices of the court from becoming an established part of the constitution. In so much a better condition were the privileges of the people even during the arbitrary reign of Edward III. than during some subsequent ones, particularly those of the Tudors, where no tyranny or abuse of power ever met with any check or opposition, or so much as a remonstrance, from parliament.

In this reign we find, according to the fentiments of an ingenious and learned author, the first strongly marked and probably contested distinction between a proclamation by the king and his privy-council, and a law which had received the affent of the lords and commons?

It is easy to imagine, that a prince of so much sense and spirit as Edward, would be no slave to the court of Rome. Though the old tribute was paid during some years of his minority, he afterwards withheld it; and when the pope in 1367 threatened to cite him to the court of Rome, for default of payment, he laid the matter before his parliament. That affembly unanimously declared, that king John could not, without a national consent, subject his kingdom to a foreign power: And that they were therefore determined to support sheir sovereign against this unjust pretension.

DURING this reign, the statute of provisors was enacted, rendering it penal to procure any presentations to benefices from the court of Rome, and securing the rights of all patrons and electors, which had been extremely encroached on by the pope b. By a subsequent statute, y Observations on the statutes, p. 193. 2 Rymer, vol. iv. p. 434.

2 Cotton's Abridg. p. 110. b 25 Edw. III. 27 Edw. III.

1377-

every person was out-lawed who carried any cause by ap-C H A P.

peal to the court of Rome c.

THE laity at this time feem to have been extremely prejudiced against the papal power, and even somewhat against their own clergy, because of their connexions with the Roman pontiff. The parliament pretended, that the usurpations of the pope were the cause of all the plagues, injuries, famine, and poverty of the realm; were more destructive to it than all the wars; and were the reason why it contained not a third of the inhabitants and commodies, which it formerly possessed: That the taxes, levied by him, exceeded five times those which were paid to the king: That every thing was venal in that finful city of Rome; and that even the patrons in England had thence learned to practife fimony without shame or remorfed. At another time, they petition the king to employ no churchman in any office of state c; and they even speak in plain terms, of expelling by force the papal authority, and thereby providing a remedy against oppresfions, which they neither could nor would any longer endure f. Men who talked in this ftrain, were not far from the reformation: But Edward did not think proper

As to the police of the kingdom during this period, it was certainly better than during times of faction, civil war, and disorder, to which England was so often exposed: Yet were there several vices in the constitution. she bad confequences of which all the power and vigi-

to second all this zeal. Though he passed the statute of provifors, he took little care of its execution; and the parliament made frequent complaints of his negligence on this head s. He was content with having reduced fuch of the Romish ecclesiastics, as possessed revenues in England, to depend entirely upon him by means of that statute.

129, 130, 148.

lance

c 27 Edw. III. 38 Edw. III. d Cotton, p. 74. 128, 129g Ibid p. 119. 128, f Cotton, p. 41. e Ibid. p. 112.

CHAP.lance of the king could not prevent. The barons, by their confederacies with those of their own order, and by fupporting and defending their retainers in every ini-1377. quity h, were the chief abettors of robbers, murderers, and ruffians of all kinds; and no law could be executed against those criminals. The nobility were brought to give their promise in parliament, that they would not avow, retain, or support any felon or breaker of the law i; yet this engagement, which we may wonder to fee exacted from men of their rank, was never regarded by them. The commons make continual complaints of the multitude of robberies, murders, rapes, and other diforders, which, they fay, were become numberless in every part of the kingdom, and which they always afcribe to the protection that the criminals received from the great k. The king of Cyprus, who paid a visit to England in this reign, was robbed and ftripped on the highway with his whole retinue 1. Edward himself contributed to this diffolution of law, by his facility in granting pardons to felons from the folicitation of the courtiers. Laws were made to retrench this prerogative m, and remonstrances of the commons were presented against the abuse of it ": But to no purpose. The gratifying of a powerful nobleman continued still to be of more importance than the protection of the people. The king also granted many franchifes, which interrupted the course of justice and the execution of the laws °.

COMMERCE and industry were certainly at a very low ebb during this period. The bad police of the country alone affords a sufficient reason. The only exports were wool, skins, hydes, leather, butter, tin, lead, and such unmanusactured goods, of which wool was by far the most considerable. Knyghton has afferted, that 100,000

h 11 Edw. III. cap. 14. 4 Edw. III. cap. 2. 15 Edw. III. cap. 4.

i Cotton, p. 10. k Ibid. p. 51. 62. 64. 70. 160.

¹ Walling. p. 170. m xo Edw. III. cap. 2. 27 Edw. III. cap. 2.

n Cotton, p. 75. o Ibid. p. 54.

facks of wool were annually exported, and fold at twenty C H A P. pounds a fack, money of that age. But he is widely miftaken both in the quantity exported and in the value. In 1340, the parliament remonstrate, that the king, by an illegal imposition of forty shillings on each sack exported, had levied 60,000 pounds a year P: Which reduces the annual exports to 20,000 facks. A fack contained twenty-fix stone, and each stone fourteen pounds 9; and at a medium was not valued at above five pounds a fack , that is, fourteen or fifteen pounds of our prefent money. Knyghton's computation raises it to fixty pounds, which is near four times the present price of wool in England. According to this reduced computation, the export of wool brought into the kingdom about 450,000 pounds of our present money, instead of fix millions, which is an extravagant sum. Even the former sum is so high, as to afford a suspicion of some mistake in the computation of the parliament with regard to the number of facks exported. Such mistakes were very usual in those ages.

EDWARD endeavoured to introduce and promote the woollen manufacture by giving protection and encouragement to foreign weavers *, and by enacting a law, which prohibited every one from wearing any cloth but of English fabric *. The parliament prohibited the exportation of woollen goods, which was not so well judged, especially while the exportation of unwrought wool was so much allowed and encouraged. A like injudicious law was made against the exportation of manufactured iron *.

It appears from a record in the Exchequer, that in 1354 the exports of England amounted to 294,184 pounds feventeen shillings and two-pence: The imports to 38,970 pounds three shillings and fix-pence money of that time. This is a great balance, considering that it arose wholly p Ibid. p. 48. 69. 9 34 Edw. III. cap. 5. r Cotton, p. 29.

s 11 Edw. III. cap. 5. Rymer, vol. iv. p. 723. Murimuth, p. 88.

^{1 11} Edw. III. cap. 2. 4 28 Edw. III. cap. 5.

terials. The import was chiefly linen and fine cloth, and fome wine. England feems to have been extremely drained at this time by Edward's foreign expeditions and foreign fubfidies, which probably was the reason, why the exports so much exceed the imports.

THE first toll we read of in England, for mending the highways, was imposed in this reign: It was that for repairing the road between St. Giles's and Temple-Bar w.

In the first of Richard II. the parliament complains extremely of the decay of shipping during the preceding reign, and affert, that one sea-port formerly contained more vessels than were then to be found in the whole kingdom. This calamity, they ascribe to the arbitrary seizure of ships by Edward, for the service of his frequent expeditions *. The parliament in the fifth of Richard renew the same complaint *, and we likewise find it made in the forty-sixth of Edward III. So salse is the common opinion, that this reign was savourable to commerce.

THERE is an order of this king, directed to the mayor and sheriffs of London, to take up all ships of forty tun and upwards to be converted into ships of war z.

THE parliament attempted the impracticable scheme of reducing the price of labour after the pestilence, and also that of poultry a. A reaper, in the first week of August, was not allowed above two pence a day, or near fix pence of our present money; in the second week a third more. A master carpenter was limited through the whole year to three pence a day, a common carpenter to two pence, money of that age b. It is remarkable, that, in the same reign, the pay of a common soldier, an archer, was six-pence a day; which, by the change, both in denomination and value, would be equivalent to near

w Rymer, vol. v. p. 520. z Rymer, vol. iv. p. 664.

b 25 Edw. III. cap. 1. 3.

x Cotton, p: 155. 164. y Cap. 3.

five shillings of our present money c. Soldiers were then C H A P inlisted only for a very short time: They lived idle all the rest of the year, and commonly all the rest of their lives:

One successful campaign, by pay and plunder, and the ransom of prisoners, was supposed to be a small fortune to a man; which was a great allurement to enter into the service d.

THE staple of wool, wool-fells, leather, and lead, was fixed by act of parliament in particular towns of England e. Afterwards it was removed by law to Calais: But Edward, who commonly deemed his prerogative above law, paid little regard to these statutes; and when the parliament remonstrated with him on account of those acts of power, he plainly told them, that he would proceed in that matter as he thought proper f. It is not eafy to affign the reason of this great anxiety for fixing a staple; unless perhaps it invited foreigners to a market, when they knew beforehand, that they should there meet with great choice of any particular species of commodity. This policy of inviting foreigners to Calais was carried fo far, that all English merchants were prohibited by law from exporting any English goods from the staple; which was in a manner the total abandoning of all foreign navigation, except that to Calais s. A contrivance feemingly extraordinary.

c Dugdale's Baronage, vol. i. p. 784. Brady's hift. vol. ii, App. No. 92. The pay of a man at arms was quadruple. We may therefore conclude, that the numerous armies, mentioned by historians in those times, consisted chiefly of ragamussins, who followed the camp, and lived by plunder. Edward's army before Calais consisted of 21,094 men; yet its pay for fixteen months was only 127,201 pounds. Brady, ibid.

d Commodities feem to have risen fince the Conquest. Instead of being ten times cheaper than at present, they were in the age of Edward III. only three or four times. This change seems to have taken place in a great measure since Edward II. The allowance granted by Edward III. to the earl of Murray, then a prisoner in Nottingham castle, is one pound a week; whereas the bishop of St. Andrews, the primate of Scotland, had only fix-pence a day allowed him by Edward I.

Vol. II. f Cotton, p. 117. g 27 Edw. III. cap. 7.

C H A P. IT was not till the middle of this century that the English began to extend their navigation even to the Baltic h; nor till the middle of the subsequent, that they sailed to the Mediterranean i.

LUXURY was complained of in that age, as well as in others of more refinement; and attempts were made by parliament to reftrain it, particularly on the head of apparel, where furely it is the most obviously innocent and inosfensive. No man under a hundred a year was allowed to wear gold, silver, or silk in his clothes: Servants also were prohibited from eating sless meat, or sish, above once a day k. By another law it was ordained, that no one should be allowed, either for dinner or supper, above three dishes in each course, and not above two courses: And it is likewise expressly declared, that source that sound as one of these dishes. It was easy to foresee that such ridiculous laws must prove inessectual, and could never be executed.

THE use of the French language, in pleadings and public deeds, was abolished m. It may appear strange, that the nation should so long have worn this badge of conquest: But the king and nobility seem never to have become thoroughly English, or to have forgotten their French extraction, till Edward's wars with France gave them an antipathy to that nation. Yet still, it was long before the use of the English tongue came into sashion. The first English paper which we meet with in Rymer is in the year 1386, during the reign of Richard II n. There are Spanish papers in that collection of more ancient date and the use of the Latin and French still continued.

h Anderson, vol. i, p. 151.

i Id. p. 177.

k 37 Edw. III.

cap. 8, 9, 10, &c.

l 10 Edw. III.

m 36 Edw. III. cap. 15.

n Rymer, vol. vii. p. 526. This paper, by the flyle, seems to have been grawn by the Scots, and was signed by the wardens of the marches only.

Pymer, vol. vi. p. 554.

1377.

WE may judge of the ignorance of this age in geogra- C H A P. phy, from a flory told by Robert of Avesbury. Pope Clement VI. having, in 1344, created Lewis of Spain prince of the fortunate Islands, meaning the Canaries, then newly discovered; the English ambassador at Rome and his retinue were feized with an alarm, that Lewis had been created king of England; and they immediately hurried home, in order to convey this important intelligence. Yet fuch was the ardour for fludy at this time, that Speed in his Chronicle informs us, there were then 30,000 students in the univerfity of Oxford alone. What was the occupation of all these young men? To learn very bad Latin, and still worse Logic.

In 1364, the commons petitioned, that, in confideration of the preceding pestilence, such persons as posfessed manors holding of the king in chief, and had let different leafes without obtaining licences, might continue to exercise the same power, till the country were become more populous P. The commons were fenfible, that this fecurity of possession was a good means for rendering the kingdom prosperous and flourishing; yet durst not apply, all at once, for a greater relaxation of their chains.

THERE is not a reign among those of the ancient English monarchs, which deserves more to be studied than that of Edward III. nor one where the domestic transactions will better discover the true genius of that kind of mixed government, which was then established in Eng-The struggles, with regard to the validity and authority of the great charter, were now over: The king was acknowledged to lie under some limitations: Edward himself was a prince of great capacity, not governed by favourites, not led aftray by any unruly passion, sensible that nothing could be more effential to his interests than

P Cotton, p. 97.

¥377.

C H A P. to keep on good terms with his people: Yet on the whole XVI. it appears, that the government, at best, was only a barbarous monarchy, not regulated by any fixed maxims, or bounded by any certain undifputed rights, which in practice were regularly observed. The king conducted himfelf by one fet of principles; the barons by another; the commons by a third; the clergy by a fourth. All thefe fystems of government were opposite and incompatible: Each of them prevailed in its turn, as incidents were favourable to it: A great prince rendered the monarchical power predominant: The weakness of a king gave reins to the aristocracy: A superstitious age saw the clergy triumphant: The people, for whom chiefly government was inflituted, and who chiefly deferve confideration, were the weakest of the whole. But the commons, little obnoxious to any other order; though they funk under the violence of tempests, filently reared their head in more peaceable times; and while the fform was brewing, were courted by all fides, and thus received still some accession to their privileges, or, at worst, some confirmation of them.

> IT has been an established opinion, that gold coin was not struck till this reign: But there has lately been found proof that it is as ancient as Henry III. 9

⁹ See Observations on the more ancient Statutes, p. 375. 2d edit.

NOTES

TOTHE

SECOND VOLUME.

NOTE [A], p. 36.

MADOX, in his Baronia Anglica, cap. 14. tells us, That in the 30th of Henry II. thirty-three cows and two bulls cost but eight pounds seven shillings, money of that age; 500 sheep, twenty-two pounds ten shillings, or about ten pence three farthings per sheep; fixty-fix oxen, eighteen pounds three shillings; sifteen breeding mares, two pounds twelve shillings and fix-pence; and twenty-two hogs, one pound two shillings. Commodities seem then to have been about ten times cheaper than at present; all except the sheep, probably on account of the value of the sleece. The same author in his Formulare Anglicanum, p. 17. says, That in the 10th year of Richard I. mention is made of ten per cent. paid for money: But the Jews frequently exacted much higher interest.

NOTE [B], p. 253.

R YMER, vol. ii. p. 216. 845. There cannot be the least question, that the homage usually paid by the king; of Scotland was not for their crown, but for some other territory. The only question remains, what that territory was? It was not always for the earldom of Huntingdon, nor the honour of Penryth; because we find it sometimes done at a time when these possessions were not in the hands of the kings of Scotland. It is probable, that the homage was performed in general terms without any particular specification of territory; and this inaccuracy had proceeded either from some dispute between the two kings about the territory and some opposite K k 3 claims, which were compromised by the general homage, or from the simplicity of the age, which employed sew words in every transaction. To prove this we need but look into the letter of king Richard, where he resigns the homage of Scotland, reserving the usual homage. His words are, Sæpedistus W. Rex ligius bomo noster deveniat de omnibus terris de quibus antecessores sui antecessorum nostrorum ligii homines suerunt, et nobis atque hæredibus nostris sidelitatem jurarunt. Rymer, vol. i. p. 65. These general terms were probably copied from the usual form of the homage itself.

It is no proof that the kings of Scotland possessed no lands or baronies in England, because we cannot find them in the imperfect histories and records of that age. For instance, it clearly appears from another passage of this very letter of Richard, that the Scottish king held lands both in the county of Huntingdon and elsewhere in England; though the earldom of Huntingdon itself was then in the person of his brother, David: and we know at present of no other baronies, which William held. It cannot be expected that we should now be able to specify all his fees which he either possessed or claimed in England; when it is probable that the two monarchs themfelves and their ministers would at that very time have differed in the lift: The Scotish king might possess some to which his right was disputed; he might claim others, which he did not posses: And neither of the two kings was willing to resign his pretenfions by a particular enumeration.

A late author of great industry and learning, but full of prejudices, and of no penetration, Mr. Carte, has taken advantage of the undefined terms of the Scotch homage, and has pretended that it was done for Lothian and Galloway, that is, all the territories of the country now called Scotland, lying fouth of the Clyde and Forth. But to refute this pretension at once, we need only consider, that if these territories were held in see of the English kings, there would, by the nature of the feudal law, as established in England, have been continual appeals from them to the courts of the lord Paramount; contrary to all the histories and records of that age. We find, that, as soon as Edward really established his superiority, appeals immediately commenced from all parts of Scotland: And that

king,

king, in his writ to the king's-bench, confiders them as a necessary confequence of the feudal tenure. Such large territories also would have supplied a confiderable part of the English armies, which never could have escaped all the historians. Not to mention that there is not any instance of a Scotch prisoner of war being tried as a rebel, in the frequent hostilities between the kingdoms, where the Scotish armies were chiefly filled from the southern counties.

Mr. Carte's notion with regard to Galloway, which comprehends, in the language of that age, or rather in that of the preceding, most of the south-west counties of Scotland; his notion, I say, rests on so slight a foundation, that it scarcely merits being resulted. He will have it (and merely because he will have it) that the Cumberland, yielded by king Edmund to Malcolm I. meant not only the county in England of that name, but all the territory northwards to the Clyde. But the case of Lothian deserves some more consideration.

It is certain, that in very ancient language, Scotland means only the country north of the friths of Clyde and Forth. I shall not make a parade of literature to prove it; because I do not find that this point is disputed by the Scots themselves. The fouthern country was divided into Galloway and Lothian; and the latter comprehended all the fouth-east counties. This territory was certainly a part of the ancient kingdom of Northumberland, and was entirely peopled by Saxons, who afterwards received a great mixture of Danes among them. It appears from all the English histories, that the whole kingdom of Northumberland paid very little obedience to the Anglo-Saxon monarchs, who governed after the diffolution of the heptarchy; and the northern and remote parts of it feem to have fallen into a kind of anarchy, fometimes pillaged by the Danes, fometimes joining them in their ravages upon other parts of England. The kings of Scotland, lying nearer them, took at last possession of the country, which had scarcely any government; and we are told by Matthew of Westminster, p. 193. that king Edgar made a grant of the territory to Kenneth III. that is, he refigned claims, which he could not make effectual, without bestowing on them more trouble and expence than they were worth: For these are the only grants of provinces Kk4 provinces made by kings; and fo ambitious and active a prince as Edgar would never have made presents of any other kind. Tho' Matthew of Westminster's authority may appear small with regard to fo remote a transaction; yet we may admit it in this case, because Ordericus Vitalis, a good authority, tells us, p. 701. that Malcolm acknowledged to William Rufus, that the Conqueror had confirmed to him the former grant of Lothian. But it follows not, because Edgar made this species of grant to Kenneth, that therefore he exacted homage for that territory. Homage and all the rites of the feudal law were very little known among the Saxons; and we may also suppose, that the claim of Edgar was so antiquated and weak. that, in refigning it, he made no very valuable concession, and Kenneth might well refuse to hold, by so precarious a tenure, a territory, which he at prefent held by the fword. In short, no author fays, he did homage for it.

The only colour indeed of authority for Mr. Carte's notion is, that Matthew Paris, who wrote in the reign of Henry III. before Edward's claim of fuperiority was heard of, fays that Alexander III. did homage to Henry III. pro Laudiano et aliis terris. See page 555. This word feems naturally to be interpreted Lothian. But, in the first place, Matthew Paris's testimony, though considerable, will not outweigh that of all the other historians, who fay that the Scotch homage was always done for lands in England. Secondly, if the Scotch homage was done in general terms (as has been already proved), it is no wonder that historians should differ in their account of the object of it, since, it is probable, the parties themselves were not fully agreed. Thirdly, there is reason to think that Laudianum in Matthew Paris does not mean the Lothians, now in Scotland. There appears to have been a territory, which anciently bore that or a fimilar name, in the north of England. For (1) The Saxon Chronicle, p. 197. fays, that Malcolm Kenmure met William Rufus in Lodene in England. (2) It is agreed by all historians, that Henry II. only reconquered from Scotland the northern counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmorland. See Newbriggs, p. 383. Wykes, p. 30. Hemingford, p. 492. Yet the same country is called by other historians Loidis, comitatus Lodonensis, nenfis, or some such name. See M. Paris, p. 68. M. West. p. 247. Annal. Waverl. p. 159. and Diceto, p. 531. (3) This last mentioned author, when he speaks of Lothian in Scotland, calls it Loheneis, p. 574. though he had called the English territory Loidis.

I thought this long note necessary in order to correct Mr. Carte's mistake, an author whose diligence and industry has given light to many passages of the more ancient English history.

NOTE [C], p. 253.

R Y M E R, vol. ii. p. 543. It is remarkable that the English chancellor spoke to the Scotch parliament in the French tongue. This was also the language commonly made use of by all parties on that occasion. Ibid. passim. Some of the most considerable among the Scotch, as well as almost all the English barons, were of French origin; they valued themselves upon it; and pretended to despise the language and manners of the island. It is difficult to account for the settlement of so many French families in Scotland, the Bruces, Baliols, St. Clairs, Montgomeries, Somervilles, Gordons, Frasers, Cummins, Colvilles, Umfrevilles, Mowbrays, Hays, Maules, who were not supported there, as in England, by the power of the sword. But the superiority of the smallest civility and knowledge over total ignorance and barbarism, is prodigious.

NOTE [D], p. 259.

SEE Rymer, vol. ii. p. 533. where Edward writes to the King's Bench to receive appeals from Scotland. He knew the practice to be new and unufual; yet he establishes it as an infallible consequence of his superiority. We learn also from the same collection, p. 603, that immediately upon receiving the homage, he changed the style of his address to the Scotch king, whom he now calls dilecto & fideli, instead of fratri dilecto & fideli, the appellation which he had always before used to him; see p. 109. 124. 168. 280. 1064. This is a certain proof, that he himself was not deceived, as was scarcely indeed possible, but that he was conscious of his usurpation. Yet he solemnly swore afterwards to the justice of his pretensions, when he desended them before pope Boniface.

NOTE

NOTE [E], p. 276.

HROUGHOUT the reign of Edw. I. the affent of the commons is not once expressed in any of the enacting clauses; nor in the reigns ensuing, till the o Edw. III. nor in any of the enacting clauses of 16 Rich. II. Nay even so low as Hen. VI. from the beginning till the 8th of his reign, the affent of the commons is not once expressed in any enacting clause. See preface to Ruffhead's edit. of the Statutes, p. 7. If it should be afferted, that the commons had really given their affent to these statutes, though they are not expressly mentioned; this very omission, proceeding, if you will, from carelessness, is a proof how little they were respected. The commons were fo little accustomed to transact public business, that they had no fpeaker, till after the parliament 6th Edw. III. See Prynne's preface to Cotton's abridg. Not till the first of Richard II. in the opinion of most antiquaries. The commons were very unwilling to meddle in any state affairs, and commonly either referred themselves to the lords, or defired a select committee of that house to affist them, as appears from Cotton. 5 E. III. n. 5; 15 E. III. n. 17; 21 E. III. n. 5; 47 E. III. n. 5; 50 E. III. n. 10; 51 E. III. n. 18; 1 R. II. n. 12; 2 R. II. n. 12; 5 R. II. n. 14; 2 parl. 6 R. II. n. 14; parl. 2. 6 R. II. n. 8, &c.

NOTE [F], p. 277.

T was very agreeable to the maxims of all the feudal governments, that every order of the state should give their consent to the acts which more immediately concerned them; and as the notion of a political system was not then so well understood, the other orders of the state were often not consulted on these occasions. In this reign, even the merchants, though no public body, granted the king impositions on merchandize, because the sirst payments came out of their pockets. They did the same in the reign of Edward III. but the commons had then observed that the people paid these duties, though the merchants advanced them; and they therefore remonstrated against this practice. Cotton's abridg. p. 39. The taxes imposed by the knights on the counties were always lighter than those which the burgesses laid on the boroughs; a presumption, that in voting those taxes the knights and burgeffes did not form the same house. See Chancellor West's enquiry into the manner of creating peers, p. 8. But there are fo many proofs, that those two orders of representatives were long separate, that it is needlefs to infift on them. Mr. Carte, who had carefully confulted the rolls of parliament, affirms, that they never appear to have been united till the 16th of Edward III. See Hift. vol. ii. p. 451. But it is certain that this union was not even then final: In 1372, the burgeffes acted by themselves, and voted a tax after the knights were dismissed. See Tyrrel, Hist. vol. iii. p. 734. from Rot. Clauf. 46 Edw. III. n. g. In 1376, they were the knights alone, who passed a vote for the removal of Alice Pierce from the king's person. if we may credit Walfingham, p. 189. There is an instance of a like kind in the reign of Richard II. Cotton, p. 193. The different taxes voted by those two branches of the lower house, naturally kept them separate: But as their petitions had mostly the same object, namely, the redress of grievances. and the support of law and justice both against the crown and the barons, this cause as naturally united them, and was the reason why they at last joined in one house for the dispatch of bufiness. The barons had few petitions. Their privileges were of more ancient date: Grievances feldom affected them: They were themselves the chief oppressors. In 1333, the knights by themselves concurred with the bishops and barons in advising the king to stay his journey into Ireland. Here was a petition which regarded a matter of flate, and was supposed to be above the capacity of the burgesses. The knights, therefore, acted apart in this petition. See Cotton, abridg. p. 13. Chief baron Gilbert thinks, that the reason why taxes always began with the commons or burgesses was, that they were limited by the instructions of their boroughs. See Hist. of the Exchequer, p. 37.

NOTE [G], p. 278.

T HE chief argument from ancient authority, for the opinion that the representatives of boroughs preceded the forty-ninth of Henry III. is the famous petition of the borough of St. Albans, first taken notice of by Selden, and then by Petyt, Peyt, Brady, Tyrrel, and others. In this petition, prefented to the parliament in the reign of Edward II. the town of St. Albans afferts, that though they held in capite of the crown, and owed only, for all other fervice, their attendance in parliament, yet the sheriff had omitted them in his writs; whereas both in the reign of the king's father, and all his predeceffors, they had always fent members. Now, fay the defenders of this opinion, if the commencement of the house of commons were in Henry III.'s reign, this expression could not have been used. But Madox, in his History of the Exchequer, p. 522, 523, 524, has endeavoured, and with great reason, to destroy the authority of this petition for the purpose alleged. He afferts, first, that there was no such tenure in England as that of holding by attendance in parliament, instead of all other fervice. Secondly, That the borough of St. Albans never held of the crown at all, but was always demesne land of the abbot. It is no wonder, therefore, that a petition which advances two falsehoods, should contain one historical mistake. which indeed amounts only to an inaccurate and exaggerated expression; no strange matter in ignorant Burgesses of that age. Accordingly St. Albans continued fill to belong to the abbot. It never held of the crown, till after the diffolution of the monasteries. But the assurance of these petitioners is remarkable. They wanted to shake off the authority of their abbot, and to hold of the king; but were unwilling to pay any fervices even to the crown: Upon which they framed this idle petition, which later writers have made the foundation of fo many inferences and conclusions. From the tenor of the petition it appears, that there was a close connection between holding of the crown, and being represented in parliament: The latter had scarcely ever place without the former: Yet we learn from Tyrrel's Append. vol. iv. that there were fome inflances to the contrary. It is not improbable, that Edward followed the roll of the earl of Leicester, who had summoned, without distinction, all the considerable boroughs of the kingdom: among which there might be some few that did not hold of the crown. Edward also found it necessary to impose taxes on all the boroughs in the kingdom without distinction. This was a good expedient for augmenting his revenue.

are not to imagine, because the house of commons have fince become of great importance, that the first summoning of them would form any remarkable and striking epoch, and be generally known to the people even seventy or eighty years after. So ignorant were the generality of men in that age, that country burgesses would readily imagine an innovation, seemingly so little material, to have existed from time immemorial, because it was beyond their own memory, and perhaps that of their fathers. Even the parliament in the reign of Henry V. say, that Ireland had, from the beginning of time, been subject to the crown of England. (See Brady.) And surely, if any thing interests the people above all others, it is war and conquests, with their dates and circumstances,

NOTE [H], p. 443.

HIS flory of the fix burgesses of Calais, like all other extraordinary stories, is somewhat to be suspected; and so much the more as Avesbury, p. 167, who is particular in his narration of the furrender of Calais, fays nothing of it: and on the contrary extols in general the king's generofity and lenity to the inhabitants. The numberless mistakes of Froisfard, proceeding either from negligence, credulity, or love of the marvellous, invalidate very much his testimony, even though he was a contemporary, and though his history was dedicated to queen Philippa herfelf. It is a mistake to imagine, that the patrons of dedications read the books, much less youch for all the contents of them. It is not a slight teftimony, that should make us give credit to a story so dishonourable to Edward, especially after that proof of his humanity, in allowing a free passage to all the women, children, and infirm people, at the beginning of the fiege; at least, it is carcely to be believed, that, if the story has any foundation, he feriously meant to execute his menaces against the fix townsmen of Calais.

NOTE [I], p. 448.

THERE was a fingular inftance about this time of the prevalence of chivalry and gallantry in the nations of Europe. A folemn duel of thirty knights against thirty was fought between Bembrough, an Englishman, and Beaumanoir, a Breton, a Breton, of the party of Charles of Blois. The knights of the two nations came into the field; and before the combat bagan, Beaumanoir called out, that it would be feen that day who had the fairest mistresses. After a bloody combat the Bretons prevailed; and gained for their prize, full liberty to boast of their mistresses beauty. It is remarkable, that two such samous generals as Sir Robert Knolles, and Sir Hugh Calverley, drew their swords in this ridiculous contest. See Pere Daniel, vol. ii. p. 536, 537, &c. The women not only instigated the champions to those rough, if not bloody frays of tournament; but also frequented the tournaments during all the reign of Edward, whose spirit of gallantry encouraged this practice. See Knyghton, p. 2597.

NOTE [K], p. 469.

HIS is a prodigious fum, and probably near the half of what the king received from the parliament during the whole course of his reign. It must be remarked, that a tenth and fifteenth (which was always thought a high grant) were, in the eighth year of his reign, fixed at about 29,000 pounds: There were faid to be near 30,000 facks of wool exported every year: A fack of wool was at a medium fold for five pounds. Upon these suppositions it would be easy to compute all the parliamentary grants, taking the lift as they fland in Tyrrel, vol. iii. p. 780: Though fomewhat must still be left to conjecture. This king levied more money on his fubjects than any of his predecessors; and the parliament frequently complain of the poverty of the people, and the oppreffions under which they laboured. But it is to be remarked, that a third of the French king's ranfom was yet unpayed when war broke out anew between the two crowns: His fon chose rather to employ his money in combating the English, than in enriching them. See Rymer, vol. viii. p. 315.

